

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

The Arthur and Elizabeth SCHLESINGER LIBRARY on the History of Women in America
RADCLIFFE COLLEGE

From the collection of Eve Merriam

A HISTORY OF THE ANCIENT WORKING PEOPLE

FROM THE EARLIEST KNOWN PERIOD TO THE ADOPTION OF CHRISTIANITY
BY CONSTANTINE.

Πάντες ἐσμεν τοῦ θεοῦ τούτου διασῶται.—SOCRATES.

BY C. OSBORNE WARD,
TRANSLATOR AND LIBRARIAN, U. S. DEPT. OF LABOR.

PRESS OF THE CRAFTSMAN.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

1889.

331.09
W257.1

Entered according to Act of Congress in the Year 1888, by

C. OSBORNE WARD,

In the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

From the Collection of
The Merriman

DEDICATED

TO THE MEMORY OF COURTLANDT PALMER.

PREFACE.

The author of this volume is aware that a strong opposition may set in and perhaps for a time, object to the thoughts and the facts which it portrays.

Much of its contents is new. The ideas that lay at the bottom of the ancient competitive system, though in their day thoroughly understood, have been so systematically attacked and gnawed away during our nearly 2,000 years' trial of the new institution, that men now, no longer comprehend them. The whole may strike the reader as news. Much of it indeed, reads like a revelation from a sealed book; and we may not at first be able to comprehend it as a natural effect of a cause.

The introduction of Christianity was fought, and for a long time resisted by the laboring element itself; solely on the ground that it seriously interfered with idol, amulet, palladium and temple drapery manufacture. As shown in the chapter on "Image-makers," there were organized trades, whose labor and means of obtaining a living were entirely confined to their skill in producing for the pagan priesthood these innumerable images and paraphernalia of worship. Indeed, the ultimate introduction of certain unmistakable forms of idol worship to be found lingering in the so-called Christianity to-day, must be considered as having been partly motivated by the resistance of trades unions against any change which would result in depriving themselves and their babes of bread. This has been a potent hindrance to the ever growing but imperceptible realization of the social revolution.

The great strikes and uprisings of the working people of the ancient world are almost unknown to the living age. It matters little how accounts of five immense strike-wars, involving destruction of property and mutual slaughter of millions of people have been suppressed, or have otherwise failed to reach us;—the fact remains that people are absolutely ignorant of those great events. A meagre sketch of Spartacus may be seen in the encyclopedias, but it is always ruined and its interest pinched and blighted by being classed with crime, its heroes with criminals, its theme with desecration. Yet Spartacus was one of the great generals of history; fully equal to Hannibal and Napoleon, while his cause was much more just and infinitely nobler, his life a model of the beautiful and virtuous, his death an episode of surpassing grandeur.

Still more strange is it, that the great ten-years' war of Eunus should be unknown. He martialed at one time, an army of two hundred thousand soldiers. He manœuvred them and fought for ten full years for liberty, defeating army after army of Rome. Why is the world ignorant of this fierce, epochal rebellion?

Almost the whole matter is passed over in silence by our histories of Rome. In these pages it will be read as news; yet should a similar war rage in our day, against a similar condition of slavery, its cause would not only be considered just, but the combatants would have the sympathy and moral support of the civilized world. The story of this wonderful workman is news.

The great system of labor organization explained in these pages must likewise be regarded as a chapter of news. The portentous fact has lain in abeyance century after century, with the human family in profound ignorance of an organization of trades and other labor unions so powerful that for hundreds of years they undertook and successfully conducted the business of manufacture, of distribution, of purveying provisions to armies, of feeding the inhabitants of the largest cities in the world, of inventing, supplying and working the huge engines of war, and of collecting customs and taxes—tasks confided to their care by the state.

Our civilization has a blushingly poor excuse for its profound ignorance of these facts; for the evidences have existed from much before the beginning of our era—indeed the fragments of the ravaged history were far less broken and the recorded annals much fresher, more numerous and less mutilated than the relics which the author with arduous labor and pains-taking, has had at command in bringing them to the surface. Besides the records that have come to us thus broken and distorted by the wreckers who feared the moral blaze of literature, there were, in all probability, thousands of inscriptions then, where but dozens remain now to be consulted; and they are growing fewer and dimmer as their value rises higher in the estimation of a thinking, appreciative, gradually awakening world.

The author is keenly aware that certain critics will complain of his dragging religion so prominently forward that the work is spoiled. The defense is, that though our charming histories from a point of view of brilliant events, such as daring deeds of heroes, battles and bloodshed, may be found among the ancients without encountering much of a religious nature, yet such is not the case in the lesser affairs of ancient social and political life. The state, city and family were themselves a part of the ancient religion and were a part of its property. Priests were public officers. Home life of the nobles was in constant conformity with the ritual. The organizations of labor were so closely watched by the jealous law that they were obliged to assume a religious attitude they did not feel in order to escape being suppressed. A long list of what we in our time consider honorable, business-like doings, was rated as blasphemy against the gods and punished with death.

Nearly all of the idolatry, with its attendant superstition and nympholepsy, its giants and prodigies, its notions of elysium and tartarus, its quaking genuflections, its bloody sacrifices and its gladiatorial wakes, had their real origin in the torture of the menials who delved, and in the rewards of the favored ones who banqueted on the riches which flowed from unpaid labor; and nearly all the iconoclasm of the later sophists may perhaps be traced to an organized resistance of the working people of pre-christian days. These seemingly curious, if not extraordinary truths will, we are confident, be made clear to the intelligent, careful reader of these pages; and in this humble hope, the author has set them forth as an indispensable beginning to those who would logically and correctly understand the great problem of labor as it is to-day.

As rightly mentioned by Bancroft and others engaged in the collection and study of monumental archaeology, there is often a readiness among the degenerate natives to ingeniously imitate and palm off for genuine, numbers of fraudulent counterfeit relics upon the unsuspecting and credulous wonder-hunters. This, however, is with us, in our scope of research, placed beyond suspicion. Most of the slabs we mention have already been lying unobserved, on their original sites or in by-nooks of the museums of their own countries, for hundreds of years; but they have long since been recorded, catalogued and even numbered in dingy old books and manuscripts, the importance of their grim inscriptions having been little understood by the learned epigraphists themselves. Besides, no interest having ever been elicited on subjects of which they are so suggestive, there has been no lively demand for them, even as curiosities. They are genuine.

The author may sum up these prefatory remarks with a word on the general lesson taught by this volume; it being one of the first histories yet compiled and written exclusively from a standpoint of social science. That the "still small voice" meant the ever suppressed yet ever living, struggling, co-operating and mutually supporting majorities, is made self-suggestive without forsaking history. The phenomenal fact is moreover brought out, that the present movement whose most radical wing loudly disclaims Christianity, is nevertheless building exactly upon the precepts of that faith, as it was told to us and taught us by Jesus Christ; whatever may or may not have been borrowed by His school from the immense social organization of His own and preceding ages.

Modern greed with its class hatreds, individualisms, aristocracy, its struggle for personal wealth, dangerous, defiant in our faith and in our political economy, is not Christianity at all; it is the ancient evil still lingering in the roots of the gradually decaying paganism that appears to remain for the labor movement to smother and at last uproot and completely annihilate.

One thing must be solemnly set forth as a very suggestive hint to modern anarchists, however honest their impulses. The historical facts are that the great strikes, rebellions and social wars—if we are permitted to except those of Drimakos and the strike of the 20,000 from the the silver mines of Laurium in Attica—all turned out disastrously for the general cause. The punishments meted out to the strikers and insurgents of the working class after their overthrow by the Romans, as in the rebellions of Eunus, of Athenion, of Spartacus, of every one we have treated in this book, with but the above exceptions, was bloody, revengeful and exterminatory to the last degree. An ancient author whom we quote, gives the aggregate number crucified at something more than a million. Crassus and Pompey alone crucified over 6,000 workingmen on the Appian Way as examples of the awful blood-wreaking to be expected from Roman military justice. Twenty thousand were similarly massacred at Enna and Tauromanion. These unscrupulous deeds of retribution that went far toward annihilating the ancient civilization by stimulating a blood-thirsting craze in a long succession of Roman emperors, completely extinguished all hopes of the workingmen for the achievement of liberty by violent means.

In the light then, of these shocking truths—which every one should calmly study and consider—let us ask ourselves the profoundly relevant, home-thrust question:—shall we, a second time be suppressed and our health-inspiring agitation, our aroused and resuscitated movement, our hopes of better days, our civilization be stopped? And shall labor again succumb to a degenerate military despotism like that of the Neros, Caligulas and all the Cæsars? Here lies an alarming foreboding, if not a positive danger; for so long as labor still obstinately refuses to vote and insists upon rebellion, continues to choose the irascible rather than the diplomatic, how can it be otherwise hoped or expected than that history will repeat itself?

SOURCES OF INFORMATION.

- ÆLIAN (Claudius), Varia Historia. Lugduni in Batavis, 1709.
- AMERICAN Cyclopædia, D. Appleton & Company, N. Y. 1867.
- Anonymous, Seven Essays on Ancient Greece. Oxford, 1832.
- Antoninus (Pius), Rescript; Petit, in Thesaurus Antiquitatum, Utrecht & Leyden, 1699.
- APOCRYPHAL Gospels of the Infancy. Protevangelion, Cowper, London, 1831 and Others.
- Appian, Rhomaïke Historia, *Schweighäuser, 3 vols., Leipz. 1785.
- Apuleius, Metamorphosis, (Golden Ass), Ed. *Oudendorp, 1786.
German Paraphrase, Sacher-Masoch, Leipzig, 1877.
- Aquilius, (M.), Inscriptio Capuensis, Orelli, No. 3,308.
- Arabic Gospels of the Infancy.
- | | | |
|---|---|--------------------------------|
| Aristotle, Ethics,
 Aristotle, Logic,
 Aristotle, Politics,
 Aristotle, Metaphysics,
 Aristotle, Economics,
 Aristotle, Physics,
 Aristotle, Wonders, | } | Immanuel Bekker, Berlin, 1731. |
|---|---|--------------------------------|
- Arnobius, Disputationes Contra Gentes. (Adversus Gentes), Hildebrand, Ehler, 1845.
- Asconius, De Asconii Commentariis Disputatio, Madvig, Copenhagen, 1825.
- Athenæus, Deipnosophistæ, sive Cœnæ Sapientium Libri, "Banquet of the Learned," Natalis, de Comitibus, Veneto, 1556.
- AUTHOR of this Work, Travels on foot through the Papal States, New York Witness, in autumn of 1870.
- Aveling (Edw. B.), Die Darwin'sche Theorie, Stuttgart, 1887.
- Bancroft, (Hubert Howe), Native Races, San Francisco, 1883.
- Bellermann, Nachrichten aus dem Alterthum, Erfurt, 1789.
- BIBLE and Apocryphal Books.
- Böckh, Abhandlung der Historisch-Philologischen Classe.

* Books, Inscriptions etc., consulted by the author personally, in Europe and elsewhere

- Böckh, Corpus Inscriptionum Græcarum, Berlin, 1838-1850.
 Böckh, Die Laurischen Silberbergwerke, Berlin, 1839.
 Böckh, Staatshaushaltung der Athener, 1817.
 Boissy, Inscription de Lyon, 1880.
 Bombardini, De Carcere et Antiquo ejus Usu, in Supplement of Thesaurus Antiquitatum; Grævius et Gronovius, Utrecht, 1694, 6 vols., Folio.
 BUREAU of Labor, (United States); First annual Report, 1886.
 Bücher (Karl), Aufstände der unfreien Arbeiter, Frankfurt. 1874.
 Cæcilius Calactenus, in Plutarch's Lives of the Ten Orators, quoted also by other Ancient Authors.
 Cardinali (Clemente), Iscriz. Velletri. Diplomi Imperiali di Privilej accordati a' Militari raccolti e Commentati, Velletri, 1835. Also Memorie d' Antichità. Acad. Archaeol.
 Cato (Censorius vel Censorinus), De Re Rustica, Paris, 1644.
 Cicero, Ad Atticum,
 Cicero, De Divinitate, Cicero, Pro Domo Sua, Cicero, Ad Familiares
 Cicero, Laelius,
 Cicero, De Legibus,
 Cicero, Philosophy,
 Cicero, Pro Plancio,
 Cicero, Pro Quinctio,
 Cicero, Tusculanarum Disputationum Libri, Cicero, Verres,
 Orelli (Caspar), Zürich, 1827.
 CODEX Justinianus, Pandectæ, Institutes etc. Corpus Juris Civilis, Berthelot, Paris, 1809; Genevæ, 1594.
 CODEX Theodosii, Idem.
 Columella, De Re Rustica, Libri XII., Paris, 1543.
 Cornelius Nepos, De Excellentibus Ducibus, Dietrich, Leipzig, in Bibliotheca Teubneriana, 1861; De Illustribus Viris, Columbinus, Venice, 1567, Creuzer, Symbolik und Mithologie der alten Völker; besonders der Griechen, Heidelberg, 1810.
 Ctesicles per Athenæus, in Deipnosophistai, Dindorf, Leipzig 1827
 Darwin (Charles), Descent of Man, { New York, D. Apple-
 Darwin (Charles), Origin of Species, { ton & Company, 1883.
 Demosthenes, Orationes, Recension of Dindorf, Bibliotheca Teubneriana, Leipzig, 1849.
 Diodorus Siculus, Bibliotheca Historica, Dindorf, Leipzig, 1827.
 Diogenes, Lærtius, Greek Philosophers, Leipzig, 1829, Bi-oi kai Gnomai ton en Philosophia eudokimesanton, Hübner, Leipzig, 1828.

- Dion (Cassius), Rhomaïke Historia, et Excerpta Vaticana, N. Lonicenus, Latin Paraphrase, Venice, 1526; Fragments, Peiresc, Aix, 1629 and Sturz, Leipzig, 1824.
- Dionysius (Halicarnassus), Rhomaïke: Archæologia Romana, Hudson and Reiske, Roman Antiquities.
- Dirksen, Uebersicht der bisherigen Versuche zur Kritik und Herstellung des Textes der Zwölf-Tafel-Fragmente, Leipzig, 1824.
- Donati (Alessandro), Roma Vetus et Recens, Roma, 1632.
- D'Oroille, Sicula, Paris,
- Drumann (W.), Arbeiter und Kommunisten in Griechenland und Rom, Königsberg, 1860.
- Eckenbrecher, Die Insel Chios, Berlin, 1845.
- Ely (Richard T.), French and German Socialisms, N. Y., 1883.
- ENCYCLOPÆDIA, Britanica, 8th. and other Editions.
- Epiphanius (Pentaglottos, Saint), Panarion: Essenes, Hemo-ro-Baptists, Ebionites etc. *Patavinus, 2 v. folio, Paris, 1622.
- Eratosthenes, Orations. Eratosthenica, Berlin, Bernhardt, 1822. Hiller, Leipzig, 1872.
- Euripides Iphigenia, Euripides, Troads,
 Euripides, Alcestis, } W. Dindorf, Leipzig, 4 v., 1863.
- Eusebius, (Cæsarea,) Ecclesiastical History, Eusebius, (Cæsarea,) Vita Contemplativa, Cantabrigæ 1720.
 Eusebius (Cæsarea), Præparatio Evangelica, frag.
- Eutropius (Flavius,) Epitomes, or Breviarium Rerum Romanorum, Grosse, Halle, 1813.
- Fabretti (Raffaello), Inscriptionum Italicarum, Ævi Antiquioris, Turin, 1867.
- Fabretti (Raffaello). Inscriptionum Antiquarum Explicatio, Roma, 1683
- Fenestella (Lucius), Annales. Quoted by later writers.
- Fischer (Johann Friedrich), Edition of Florus with copious Latin Notes, Leipzig, 1769.
- Fiske (John), American Political Ideas, New York, 1885.
- Foucart (P.), Associations Religieuses chez les Grecs: Thïases, Orgéons, Eranes, Paris, 1883.
- Friedländer, Darstellung aus der Sittengeschichte Roms.
- Frontinus (Sextus Julius), De Aquis Urbis Romæ, *Pole-nus, Pavia, 1722.
- Fustel (de Coulanges), Cité Antique. Eleventh Edition, Paris, 1885.
- Gaius, Institutes; Digest of Justinian. Palimpsest of Niebuhr.
- Gellius (Aulus), Noctes Atticæ: Attic Nights, Bähr, Geschichte der Römischen Literatur, Carlsruhe, 1845.
- Gibbon (Edward), Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, New York, The Harpers, 1850.

- Gorius (Antonius), Etruscae Inscriptiones, Roma, 1726; Thesaurus Antiquitatum Grævii et Gronovii, Utrecht, 1699.
- Granier (de Cassagnac, Adolphe), Histoire des Classes Ouvrières, et des Classes Bourgeoises, Paris, 1838.
- Grote (George), History of Greece, London, 1846.
- Grote (George), Plato and the other Companions of Socrates, London, 1865.
- Gruter (Jan), Inscriptiones Antiquæ totius Orbis Romanorum, Heidelberg, 1604.
- Guhl and Koner, Life of the Greeks and Romans, Translation of Hüffer, London, n. d.
- Hermann (Charles Frederick), Political Antiquities of Greece, Oxford, 1836.
- Herodotus, Herodoti Historiæ, *Schweighäuser, Strasburg, 1816; Histories, Cary's Translation, in Bohn's Classical Library, London, 1885.
- Hewitt (Abram S.), Speech in the House of Representatives, on the Emancipation of Labor, April, 1884.
- Homer, Iliad, { *Bekker, Berlin, 1843.
- Homer, Odyssey, {
- Horace, Carmina, { *Orelli, Zürich, 1859.
- Horace, Epistolæ, {
- Horace, Sermo, {
- Hamilton (William), Researches in Asia Minor, London, n. d.
- Heer (Oswald), Urwelt der Schweiz, Zürich, 1877.
- Heeren (A. H.), Peuple de l' Antiquité, French Ed., Paris, 1799.
- Heinecius, (Johann Michael), Works on Antiquities, Halle, 1722.
- Henzen (Guiliemus), Supplement to Orelliana Inscriptionum Collectio, Zürich, 1861.
- INTERNATIONAL Cyclopædia.
- *Isocrates, Panegyricus, Baiter and Sauppe. Zürich, 1850.
- Ister, Lost Works, Aph. Schol., Aristophanis Byzantii Fragmenta*, Nauck, Leipzig, 1849.
- Josephus, (Flavius), Antiquities and Wars of the Jews, Whiston's English Translation, London, 1737.
- Justin Dial, Cum Tryphone. (Certain obscure Passages.)
- Kitto, Cyclopædia of Biblical Literature, London, 1850.
- Lælius, In Orelli's Cicero, Zürich, 1829.
- La Rousse, Dictionnaire Universel, Paris, Edition of 1870.
- Lampridius (Ælius), in Augusta Historiæ;—Alexander Severus, From the *Palatine MS.
- Laveleye (Emile de), Primitive Property, English Translation of Marriott, London, 1878.
- Le Play (F.), Organization of Labor, English Translation of Emerson, Philadelphia, 1872.
- Livy (Titus), Annales: Ab Urbe Condita Opera quæ supersunt, Weissenborn, Bibliotheca Teubneriana, Leipzig, 1855.

- Lytton-Bulwer, Last Days of Pompeii, London, 1835.
 Lobeck (Christian August), Aglaophon, Königsberg, 1824.
 Lucian (Logographos Samosatæ), Somnium: Vita Luciana, Jacobitz, in Bibliotheca Teubneriana, Leipzig, 1855.
 Lucretius (Titus Carus), De Rerum Natura, Bernasius, Bibliotheca Teubneriana, Leipzig, 1854.
 Lüders, (Otto), Die Dionysischen Künstler, Berlin, 1873.
 McCullagh (W. Torrens), Industrial History of Free Nations: The Greeks, London, 1846.
 McCulloch (John Ramsey), Life of Ricardo, London, 1876.
 Mackenzie (Lord), Roman Law, Edinburgh, 1870.
 Macrobius (Ambrosius Aurelius Theodosius) Saturnaliornm et Somnium Scipionis Libri, Eyssenhardt, Leipzig, 1868.
 Maffei (Francisco Scipione), Museum Veronese, Verona, 1749.
 Mann (Henry), History of Ancient and Mediæval Republics, New York, Barnes & Company, n. d.
 Mannert (Conrad), History of the Vandals, 1785.
 Mannert (Conrad), Geschichte der Vandalen, Leipzig, 1790.
 Marquardt (Becker-Marquardt), Handbuch des Römischen Alterthums, Dresden, 1843.
 Maurice (Barthélemy), Histoire Politique et Anecdote des Prisons de la Seine, Paris, 1840.
 MEMOIRES Présentiés à l' Académie: Livre II., 977.
 Millar (John), Origin of Ranks, Basil, 1793.
 Millman (Henry Hart), History of the Jews, Oxford, 1829.
 Millin (Aubin Louis), Voyages, Paris, 1790.
 MINOKHIED, in Zeitschrift der morgenländischen Gesellschaft.
 Mommsen (Theodor), De Collegiis et Sodaliciis Romanorum, Killiæ, 1843.
 Mommsen (Theodor), Corpus Inscriptionum Latinarum, with the assistance of the königl. Akademie der Wissenschaften.
 Morgan, (Lewis H.), Ancient Societies, New York, 1878.
 Müller (K. O.), Die Dorier, Göttingen, 1824.
 Muratorius (Ludovicus Antonius), Antiquitates Medii Ævi, Milan, 1742.
 Muratorius (Ludovicus Antonius), Thesaurus Veterum Inscriptionum, Milan, 1739.
 New Testament.
 *Nicolaus (Damascenus), Fragmenta Historiæ; also quoted by later ancient Authors, Recensio Orellii, Leipz. 1804.
 Nymphodorus, Nomima Asias, per Athenæus in Deipnosophistai, Dindorf, Leipzig, 1837; also Scholiast Edition, Venice, 1556.
 Marini (G.), Atti Dei Fradelli Arvali, Roma, 1796.
 Oderico (G. L.), Inscriptions and Numismatics, Genoa, 1796.

- Orellius (Io. Caspar), Inscriptionum Latinarum Selectarum Amplissima Collectio. Zürich 1828.
- *Orosius (Paulus), Libri VII. Historiarum Adversus Paganos, Editio princeps, Vienna, 1471.
- Ovid (Publius Naso), Fastorum Libri qui supersunt, Merkel and Riese, 1857.
- PANDECTÆ Justiniani, Samuel Petit in Thesaurus Grævii et Gronovii, Utrecht, 1699.
- Pausanias, Hellados Periegesis (Descriptio Græciæ), Teubner Series, Leipzig, Schubart, 1850.
- Peiresc (Nicholas Claude), Dionis Cassii Excerpta Vaticana, Aix, 1635.
- Petit (Samuel), Studies of the Arundelian Inscription*, Paris, 1640; also Several other Criticisms.
- Philo (Judæus), Quod Omnis Probus Liber, *Turnebus Paris, 1552; Legarde, Onomastica Sacra, Paris, 1870.,
- | | |
|--|---|
| Plato, Apology of Socrates , | } Bekker, London ed., 1828,
Stallbaum, Leipzig, 1825,
Orell., Winkelman, Baiter 1840
Burges, Cary, Davis, trs. |
| Plato, Menæxenos , | |
| Plato, Minos , | |
| Plato, Phædo , | |
| Plato, Phædrus , | |
| Plato, Protagoras , | |
| Plato, De Republica , | |
| Plato, Statesman , | |
| Plato, Theætetus , | |
| Plutarch, Lives of Illustrious Men , Teubner Series, Leipzig, 1850; English Translation of Langhorne, London, n. d. | |
| Polybius, Historia Katholike , Leipzig, 1843. | |
| Pomponius-Mela, De Orbis Situ , Tzschucke, Leipzig, 1807. | |
| Porter, (George Richardson), Progress of the Nation , Lon. 1836. | |
| Preller (Ludwig), Mithologie: Demeter und Persephone , Leipzig, 1854. | |
| Prudentius (Aurelius) Hymni , *Arvali, Roma, 1790. | |
| PSEUDO-Plutarch, De Nobilitate , in the Teubner Series, 1845. | |
| Rangabé-Rhizo, Antiquités Helléniques , 2 vols. Paris, 1855. | |
| REAL Encyclopædie , Pauly. | |
| Reinesius (Thomas), Inscriptionum Antiquarum Syntagma , Leipzig, 1682, Oracles: Sibylline Books , 1704. | |
| Renan (Ernest), Vie de Jésus , Paris, 1863. | |
| Rinaldo, Memorie Istoriche della Città di Capua , Nàpoli, 1755. | |
| Ritschl (Friedrich Wilhelm), Plautus , Bonn, 1848. | |
| Rodbertus (von Jägetzow), Der Normal Arbeitstag , Berlin, 1871. | |
| Roscher (Wilhelm), Principes d' Economie Politique , French Edition, Paris, 1872. | |
| Rogers (J. E. Thorold), Six Centuries of Work and Wages , New York, 1884. | |

- Rohden, Johannis der Täufer, Brochure; A Dissertation.
- Romanelli (Domenico), Topografia: Viaggio a Pompej.
- Rose (H. J.), Inscriptiones Græcæ Vetustissimæ, Cantabrigiæ,, 1825.
- Ross (Ludwig), Voyages dans les Îles; Les Inscriptions de Scio, Halle, 1842.
- Rossi (Giovanni Bernardo de), Inscriptiones Christianæ Urbis Romæ, Roma, 1853.
- Saint-Edme (M. B.) Dictionnaire de la Pénalité, Paris, 1825.
- Sallustius (Caius Crispus), Historiarum Libri Quinque, Vatican Fragments; Schambach's Sklavenaufstand.
- Sanger (William W.), History of Prostitution, New York, 1876.
- Schambach, Der Italische Sklavenaufstand, n. d., n. p., 4to.
- Schliemann (Henry), The Tiryns, New York, 1885.
- Schömann (F. G.), Assemblies of the Athenians, English University Translation of Cambridge, 1837.
- *Servius, On the Æneid of Virgil, Fabricius, Meissen, 1551.
- Siefert (Otto), Sicilische Sklavenkriege, Altona, 1860.
- Smith (William), Dictionary of the Bible, Boston, 1886.
- Smith (William), Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography, London, 1849.
- Solon, Code, in Plutarch, Gaius and others.
- Stobæus, Quoting Lost Works of Florilus, mentioned by Bücher.
- Strabo, Geographica, Tzschucke, Leipzig, 1812.
- Suetonius (Claudius), Vitæ Duodecim Cæsarum, Burmann, Amsterdam, 1743.
- Syncellus, Quoting Africanus, in Chronica.
- Tarrentenus (Paternus), De Re Militari, Quoted by Drumann.
- Terence (Publius Afer), Heauton-timorumanos, London, 1857.
- Tertulian (Quintus Septimius Florens), Apologeticus and De Idololatria, Ehler, Leip. 1857; Dr. March, Douglass Series, New York, 1876.
- Theophrastus, Ethikoi Karakteres (Moral Characters), Ast, Munich, 1825.
- Theopompus, In *Plutarch, De Iside et Osiride.
- Thiersch (Henry W.) Christian Commonwealth, Edinburgh, 1877.
- Thucydides, Polemon ton Peloponnesion (De Bello Peloponnesiaco), Leipzig, Bibliotheca Teubneriana, Böhme, 1857.
- Tompkins (Henry), Friendly Societies of Antiquity, Lon., 1867.
- Tompkins (Henry, Acting Secretary to Registry, of Friendly Societies of Great Britain), Reports, London, 1867-9.
- Ulpian (Domitius), De Officio Proconsulis; Vatican MS. & Excerpta Digestorum; De Minorum Sævitia, Bonn, 1840.
- Uwaroff, Essai sur les Mystères d' Eleusis.
- Valerius Maximus, Factorum Dictorumque Memorabilium Libri IX. Leipzig, 1836.

- Varro (Marcus Terentius), De Re Rustica Libri Tres, *Schneider, Leipzig, 1796.
- Velleius (Paterculus), Historiæ Romanæ, Orelli, Leipzig, 1835.
- Virgil (Publius Maro), Æneid, Teubner Series, Leipzig, 1840.
- Wallace, (Robert), Numbers of Mankind, Edinburgh, 1753.
- Weissenborn, Comments on Livy, Leipzig, 1871.
- Wesseling (Peter) Veterum Romanorum Itineraria, Utr't, 1750.
- Wescher-Foucart, Inscriptions recueillies à Delphes, Paris, 1863.
- Wescher (C.), In Revue Archéologique, Paris, 1864.
- Westermann (Anton), Nymphodorus, In Real-Encyclopædie Wiener-Jahrbuch, XX.
- Wilkinson (Sir Gardner), Ancient Egyptians, Boston, 1883.
- Wordsworth (Christopher), Fragments of Early Latin, London.
- Wright (Carroll D.), Industrial Depressions, Report of the United States Bureau of Labor, Washington, 1886.
- | | |
|----------------------------------|------------------|
| Xenophon, Conversations , | } Leipzig, 1859, |
| Xenophon, Memorabilia , | |
| Xenophon, Æconomicus , | |
| Xenophon, De Republica , | |
| Xenophon, De Vectigali , | |

*The Asterisks refer to Works that were consulted by the author during his researches abroad.

CONTENTS OF THE VOLUME.

CHAPTER I.

TAINT OF LABOR.

TRAITS AND PECULIARITIES OF RACES.

Grievances of the Working Classes—The Competitive System among the Ancients—Growing Change of Taste in Readers of History—Inscriptions and suppressed Fragments more recently becoming Incentives to reflecting Readers who seek Them as a means to secure Facts—No true Democracy—No primeval Middle Class known to the Aryan Family—The Taint of Labor an Inheritance through the Pagan Religio-Political Economy. Page 37

CHAPTER II.

THE INDO-EUROPEANS.

THEIR COMPETITIVE SYSTEM.

RELIGION AND POLITICS of the Indo-Europeans Identical—Reason for Religion mixing with the Movements of Labor—The Father the Original Slaveholder—His Children the Original Slaves—Both Law and Religion empowered him to kill them—Work of Conscience in the Labor Problem. 47

CHAPTER III.

LOST MSS. ARCHÆOLOGY.

TRUE HISTORY OF LABOR FOUND ONLY IN INSCRIPTIONS AND MUTILATED ANNALS.

PROTOTYPES OF Industrial Life to be found in the Aryan and Semitic Branches—Era of Slavery—Dawn of Manumission—Patriarchal Form too advanced a Type of Government possible to primitive Man—Religious Superstition fatal to Independent Labor—Labor, Government and Religion indissolubly mixed—Concupiscence, Acquisitiveness and Irascibility a Consequence of the archaic Bully or Boss, with unlimited Powers—Right of the ancient Father to enslave, sell, torture or kill his Children—Abundant Proofs quoted—Origin of the greater and more humane Impulses—Sympathy beyond mere Self-preservation, the Result of Education—Education originated from Discussion—Discussion the Result of Grievances against the Outcast Work-people—Too rapid Increase of their Numbers notwithstanding the Sufferings—Means Organized by Owners for decimating them by Murder—Ample proof—The great Amphyctyonic League—Glimpses of a once sullen Combination of the Desperate Slaves—Incipient Organization of the Nobles Page 86

CHAPTER IV.

ELEUSINIAN MYSTERIES

ANCIENT GRIEVANCES OF THE WORKERS.

WORKING PEOPLE destitute of Souls—Original popular Beliefs—Plato finally gives them half a Soul—Modern Ignorance on the true Causes of certain Developments in History—Sympathy, the Third Great Emotion developed out of growing Reason, through mutual Commiseration of the Outcasts—A new Cult—The Unsolved Problem of the great Eleusinian Mysteries—Their wonderful Story—Grievances of slighted Workingmen—Organization impossible to Slaves except in their Strikes and Rebellions—The Aristocrats' Politics and Religion barred the Doors against Work-people—Extraorinary Whims and Antics at the Eleusinian Mysteries—The Causes of Grievances endured by the Castaway Laborers—Their Motives for Secret Organization—The Terrible Cryptia—The horrible Murders of Workingmen for Sport—Dark Deeds Unveiled—Story of the Massacre of 2,000 Workingmen—Evidence—The Grievances in Sparta—In Athens—Free Outcast Builders, Sculptors, Teachers, Priests, Dancers, Musicians, Artizans, Diggers, all more or less Organized—Return to the Eleusinian Mysteries—Conclusion. Page 83

CHAPTER V.

STRIKES AND UPRISINGS.

GRIEVANCES CONTINUED. PLANS OF ESCAPE.

FIRST KNOWN and First Tried Plan of Salvation was that of Retaliation—The Slaves test the Ordeal of Armed Force—Irrascibility of the Working Classes at length arrayed against their Masters—Typical Strikes of the ancient Workingmen—Their Inhuman Treatment—Famous Strike at the Silver Diggings of Laurium—20,000 Artisans and Laborers quit Work in a Body and go over to the Foes of their own Countrymen—The Great Peloponnesian War Decided for the Spartans, against the Athenians by this Fatal Strike. Page 133

CHAPTER VI.

GRIEVANCES.

LABOR TROUBLES AMONG THE ROMANS. MORE BLOODY PLANS OF SALVATION TRIED.

THE IRASCIBLE PLAN in Italy—Epidemic Uprisings—Attempt to Fire the City of Rome and have Things common—Conspiracy of Slaves at the Metropolis—Two Traitors—Betrayal—Deaths on the Roman Gibbet—Another Great Uprising at Sicilia—Expected Capture of the World—Land of Wine and Delight—Again the Traitor, the Betrayal and Gibbet—The Irascible Plan a Failure—Strike of the Agricultural Laborers in Etruria—Slave Labor—Character of the Etruscans—Expedition of Glabro—Fighting—Slaves Worsted—Punishment on the dreadful Cross, the ancient Block for the Low-born—Enormous Strike in the Land of Labor Organizations—One Glimpse at the Cause and Origin of Italian Brigandage—Laborers, Mechanics and Agriculturists Driven to Despair—The great Uprising in Apulia—Fierce Fighting to the Dagger's Hilt—The Overthrow, the Dungeon and the Cross.—Proof Dug from Fragments of Lost History Page 145

CHAPTER VII.

DRIMAKOS.

A QUEER OLD MAN OF THE MOUNTAINS.

STRIKE OF DRIMAKOS, the Chian Slave—Co-operation of the Irascible with the Sympathetic—A Desperate Greek Bondsman at Large—Labor Grievances of the ancient Scio—Temperament and Character of Drimakos—Vast Number of unfortunate Slaves—Revolt and Escape to the Mountains—Old Ruler of the Mountain Crags—Rigid Master and loving Friend—Great Successes—Price offered for his Head—How he lost it—The Reaction—Rich and Poor all mourn his Loss as a Calamity—The Brigands infest the Island afresh since the Demise of Drimakos—The Heroön at his Tomb—An Altar of Pagan Worship at which this Labor Hero becomes the God, reversing the Order of the ancient Rights—Ruins of his Temple still extant—Athenæus—Nymphodorus—Archæology—Views of modern Philologists. Page 163

CHAPTER VIII.

VIRIATHUS.

A GREAT REBELLION IN SPAIN.

THE Roman Slave System in Spain—Tyranny in Lusitania—Massacre of the People—Condition before the Outbreak—First Appearance of Viriathus—A Shepherd on his Native

Hills—A Giant in Stature and Intellect—He takes Command—Vetillius Outwitted—Captured and Slain—Conflict in Tartessus—Romans again Beaten—Battle of the Hill of Venus—Viriathus Slaughters another army and Humiliates Rome—Segobria Captured—Arrival of Æmilianus—He is Out-generaled and at last Beaten by Viriathus—More Battles and Victories for the Farmers—Arrival of Plautius with Fresh Roman Soldiers—Viriathus made King—More Victories—Treason, Conspiracy and Treachery Lurking in his Camps—Murdered by his own Perfidious Officers—Pomp at His Funeral—Relentless Vengeance of the Romans—Crucifixion and worse Slavery than before—The Cause Lost. Page 178

CHAPTER IX

EUNUS.

GRIEVANCES. MORE SALVATION ON THE VINDICTIVE PLAN.

THE IRASCIBLE IMPULSE in its Highest Development and most enormous Organization—Greatest of all Strikes found on Record—Gigantic Growth of Slavery—General View of Sicilian Landlordism and Servitude before the Outbreak—Great Increase of Bondsmen and Women—Enna, Home of the Goddess Ceres, becomes the Stronghold of the Great Uprising—Eunus; his Pedigree—He is made King of the Slaves—Story of his 10 Years' Reign—Somebody, ashamed to confess it, has mangled the Histories—The Fragments of Diodorus and other Noble Authors Reveal the Facts—Cruelties of Damophilus and Megallis, the immediate Cause of the Grievance—Eunus, Slave, Fire-spitter, Leader, Messiah, King—Vengeance—The innocent Daughter—Sympathy hand-in-hand with Irascibility against Avarice—Wise Selection by Eunus, of Achæus as Lieutenant—Council of War—Mass-meeting—A Plan agreed to—Cruelty of the Slaves—Their Army—The War begun—Prisons broken open and 60,000 Convicts working in the Ergastula set free—Quotations—Sweeping Extinction of the Rich—Large Numbers of Free Tramps join—Another prodigious Uprising in Southern Sicily—Cleon—Conjectures regarding this Obscure Military Genius—Union of Eunus, Achæus and Cleon—Harmony—Victories over the Romans—Insurgent Force rises to 200,000 Men—Proof—

Overthrow and Extinction of the Armies of Hypsæus—Manlius—Lentulus—The Victorious Workingmen give no Quarter—Eunus as Mimic, taunts his Enemies by Mock Theatrical, Open-Air Plays in the Sieges—Cities fall into his Hands—His Speeches—Moral Aid through the Social Struggle with Gracchus at Rome—Arrival of a Roman Army under Piso—Beginning of Reverses—Crucifixions—Demoralization—Fall of Messana—Siege of Enna—Inscriptions verifying History—Romans Repulsed—Arrival of Rupilius—Siege of Tauromanion—Wonderful Death of Comanus—Cannibalism—The City falls—Awful Crucifixions—Second Siege of Enna—Its 20,000 People are crucified on the Gibbet—Eunus captured and Devoured by Lice in a Roman Dungeon—Disastrous End of the Rebellion or so-called Servile War Page 191

CHAPTER X.

ARISTONICUS.

A BLOODY STRIKE IN ASIA MINOR.

FREEDMEN, BONDSMEN, TRAMPS and Illegitimates Rise against Oppression—Contagion of monster Strikes—Again the Irascible Plan of Rescue tried—Aristonicus of Pergamus—Story of the Murder of Titus Gracchus and of 300 Land Reformers by a Mob of Nobles at Rome—Blossius, a Noble, Espouses the Cause of the Workingmen—He goes to Pergamus—The Heliopolitai—The Commander of the Labor Army overpowers all Resistance—Battle of Leuca—Overthrow of the Romans—Death of Crassus—Arrival of the Consul Paperna—Defeat of the Insurgents—Their Punishment—Discouragement and Suicide—Aristonicus strangled, Thousands crucified and the Cause Lost—Old Authors Quoted Page 232

CHAPTER XI.

ATHENION.

ENORMOUS STRIKE AND UPRISING IN SICILY.

SECOND SICILIAN LABOR-WAR—Tryphon and Athenion—Greed and Irascibility Again Grapple—The War Plan of Salvation Repeated by Slaves and Tramps—Athenion, another remarkable General Steps Forth—Castle of the Twins in a Hideous Forest—Slaves goaded to Revolt by Treachery and Intrigue of a Politician—Rebellion and the Clangor of War—Battle in the Mountains—A Victory for the Slaves at the Heights of Engyon—Treachery of Gaddæus the Freebooter—Decoy and Crucifixions—Others cast Headlong over a Precipice—The Strike starts up Afresh at Heraclea Minora—Murder of Clonius a rich Roman Knight—Escape of Slaves from his Ergastulum—Sharp Battles under the Generalship of Salvius—Strife rekindles in the West—Battle of Alaba—The Proprætor punished for his bad Administration—Victory Again Wreathes a Laurel for the Lowly—A vast Uprising in Western Sicily—Athenion the Slave Shepherd—Another Fanatical Crank of Deeds—Rushing the Struggle for Existence—Fierce Battles and Blood-spilling—What Ordinary Readers of History have not heard of—Fourth Battle; Triokala—Meek Sacrifices by the Slaves, to the Twins of Jupiter and Thalia—March to Triokala—Jealousy—Great Battle and Carnage—Athenion Wounded—He escapes to Triokala and recovers—Fifth Battle—Lucullus marches to the Workingmen's Fortifications—Battle of Triokala—The Outcasts Victorious—Lucullus is lost from View—Sixth Battle—Servilius, another Roman General Overthrown—The Terrible Athenion Master of Sicily and King over all the Working-People—Seventh and Final Field Conflict—Battle of Macellia—Death of Athenion—Victory this Time for the Romans—End of the Rebellion—Satyros, a powerful Greek Slave escapes to the Mountains with a Force of Insurgents—They are finally lured to a Capitulation by Aquillius who treacherously turns and consigns them as Gladiators to Rome—They fight the Eighth and last Battle in the Roman Amphitheatre among wild Beasts—A ghastly mutual Suicide—The Reaction—Treachery of Aquillius Punished—The Gold-Workers pour melted Gold down his Throat...Page 145

CHAPTER XII.

SPARTACUS.

THE IRASCIBLE PLAN TESTED ON AN ENORMOUS SCALE.

RISE, VICISSITUDES and Fall of a Great General—The Strike of the Gladiators—Grievances that led to the Trouble—Growth of Slavery through Usurpation of the Land by the arrogant Optimates—What is known of Spartacus before being Sold into Slavery—Bolt of the 78 Gladiators from the Ergastulum of Lentulus at Capua—Escape of the Runaways—How they seized Weapons—Vesuvius—First Battle—Battle of the Cliffs—Rout of Clodius—Second Battle—Destruction of a Prætorian Army—Battle of the Mineral Baths—Great Increase of the Rebel Force—From a petty Strike it assumes the Proportions of Revolution—Fourth Battle; Hilt to Hilt with Varinius—Destruction of the Main Army of the Romans—Winter Quarters of Spartacus at Metapontem—Honor, Discipline and Temperance of the Workingmen—Proofs by Pliny and Plutarch—Coalition with the Organized Laborers of Italy—Uses of Gold and other Ornaments Forbidden—Wine Banned—Great Numbers Employed in the Armories of Spartacus—Fifth Battle—Battle of Mt. Garganus—Ambuscade of Arrius—Overthrow and Death of Crixus—Sixth Battle—Spartacus Destroys the Consular Army of Poplicola—Seventh Battle—Great Conflict of the River Po—Overthrow of Cassius and Defeat of the 10,000 Romans—Spartacus, now Master, assumes the Offensive—Eighth Battle—Lentulus Defeated; Great Army nearly annihilated—Mortification and Terror of the Romans—Ninth Battle—Mutina—Proconsul Cassius again Routed in a Disastrous Conflict with the wary Gladiator—Spartacus now obliged to contend with the Demon of Insubordination—Crassus elected Consul—Reverses Begin—On down to Rhegium—Sedition, Treachery, Betrayal—Workingmen's own Jealousies, Insubordination and Lack of Diplomacy cause their final Ruin—Tenth Battle—Scaling of the Six Mile Ramparts by Spartacus—Battle of Croton—Destruction of the Seceders, Granicus and Castus—Obstinate Fighting—Spartacus arrives and checks the Carnage—Petelia, the Eleventh Battle—Victory—Twelfth Battle; Silarius—Last and most Bloody Encounter—Spartacus, stabbing his Horse, Rushes sword drawn, in search of Crassus—Heaps of the slain—Dying like a King—End of the War—The great Supplicium—Pompey and Crassus, emulous of meagre Honors—Inhuman Cruelties—Awful Wreaking of Vengeance on the Cross—Dangling Bodies of 6,000 Crucified Workingmen along the Appian Way—Thousands of Others crucified—Utter Failure of the Irascible Plan of Deliverance Page 275

CHAPTER XIII.

ORGANIZATION.

ROME'S ORGANIZED WORKINGMEN AND WOMEN.

ORGANIZATION OF THE FREEDMEN—The Jus Coeundi—Roman Unions—The Collegium—Its Power and Influence—What the Poor did with their Dead—Cremation—Burial a Divine Right which they were too Lowly to Practice—Worship of borrowed Gods—Incineration or Burial and Trade Unions combined—Proofs—Glance at the Inner social Life of the ancient Brotherhoods—State Ownership and Management—Nationalized Lands—Number and Variety of Trade Unions—Struggles—Numa Pompilius First to Recognize and Uphold Trade Unions—Law of the 12 Tables taken from Solon—Harmony, Peace, Ease, steady Work, Prosperity and Plenty Lasting with little Interruption for 500 Years—Bondmen fared worse.

Page 333

CHAPTER XIV.

LAWS AGAINST COMMUNES.

THE GREAT ECONOMIC ORGANIZATIONS.

ANCIENT FEDERATIONS of Labor—How they were Employed by the Government—Nomenclature of the Brotherhoods—Categories of King Numa—Varieties and Ramifications—The Masons, Stonecutters and Bricklayers—Federation for Mutual Advantages—List of the 35 Trade Unions, under the Jus Coeundi.

Page 359

CHAPTER XV.

TRADE UNIONS.

ORGANIZED ARMOR-MAKERS OF ANTIQUITY.

TRADE UNIONS TURNED to the Manufacture of Arms and Munitions of War—How it came about—The Iron and Metal Workers—Artists in the Alloys—How Belligerent Rome was Furnished with Weapons, Shoes and Other Necessaries for Her Warriors—The Shieldmakers, Arrowsmiths, Daggermakers, War-Gun and Slingmakers, Battering-Ram-makers etc.—Bootmakers who Cobbled for the Roman Troops—Wine Men, Bakers and Sutlers—All Organized—Unions of Oil Grinders; of Pork Butchers; even of Cattle Fodderers—The Haymakers—Organized Fishermen—Ancient Labor brought charmingly near, by Inscriptions.

Page 372

CHAPTER XVI.

TRADE UNIONS.

THE GREAT TRADES VICTUALING SYSTEM.

How ROME WAS FED—Unions of Fishermen—Discovery of a Strange Inscription at Pompeii, Proving the Political Power and Organization of the Workingmen and Women's Unions—Female Suffrage in Italy—The Fish Salters—Wine Smokers—Union of Spicemen—The Game-Hunters' Organizations—Unions of Amphitheatre-Sweepers—Unions of Wagoners, Ox-Drivers, Muleteers, Cooks, Weighers, Tasters and Milkmen—The Cooking Utensil-Makers—Unions of Stewards—Old Familiar Latin Names, with Familiar English Meanings Reproduced—Gaius and the Twelve Tables—Numerous Notes with References to Archæological Collections and to Histories Giving Pages and many Necessary Renderings, of the Obscure Curiosities Described Page 389

CHAPTER XVII.

INDUSTRIAL COMMUNES

AMUSEMENTS OF OLD. UNIONS OF PLAYERS

THE COLLEGIA SCÆNICORUM—Unions of Mimics—Horrible Mimic Performances in Sicily—Bloody Origin of Wakes—Unions of Dancers, Trumpeters, Bagpipers, and Hornblowers—The Flute Players—Roman Games—Unions of Circus Performers—Of Gladiators—Of Actors—Murdering Robust Wrestlers for Holiday Pastimes—Unions of Fortunetellers—Proofs in the Inscriptions—Feroocious Gladiatorial Scenes between the Workingmen and Tigers, Lions, Bears, and Other Wild Beasts made compulsory by Roman Law. Page 401

CHAPTER XVIII.

TRADE UNIONS.

THE ANCIENT CLOTHING-CUTTERS.

HOW THE ANCIENTS WERE CLOTHED—The Unions of Fullers—Of Linen Weavers, Wool-carders, Cloth-combers—Inscriptions as Proof—Later Laws of Theodosius and Justinian Revised—Government Cloth Mills—What was Meant by Public Works—Who managed Manufactures—The Dyers—Old-fashioned Shoes of the Forefathers—How made—Origin of the Crispins—The Furriers' Union—Roman Ladies and Fineries of Fur—The great Ragamuffin Trade—Their Innumerable Unions—Ragpickers of Antiquity—Origin of the Cen-tajuele—Organization of the Real Tatterdemalions—Origin of the Gypsies—Hypothesis Page 415

CHAPTER XIX.

TRADE UNIONS.

THE PAGAN AND CHRISTIAN IMAGE MAKERS.

ORGANIZATIONS OF PEOPLE who worked for the Gods—Big and little Godsmiths—Their Unions object to the New Religion of Christianity because this, originally Repudiating Idolatry, Ruined their Business—Compromise which Originated the Idolatry in the Church of to-day—The Cabatores—Unions of Ivory Workers—Of Bisellarii or Deity-Sedan-Makers—Of Imagemakers in Plaster—The Unquentarii or Unions of Perfumemakers—Holy Ointments and the Unions that manufactured them—Etruscan Trinketmakers—Bookbinders—No Proof yet found of their Organization. Page 428

CHAPTER XX.

TRADE UNIONS CONCLUDED.

THE TAX-GATHERERS. FINAL REFLECTIONS.

UNIONS OF COLLECTORS—A Vast Organized System with a Uniform and Harmoniously Working Business—Trade Unions under Government Aid and Security—The Ager Publicus of Rome—True Golden Age of Organized Labor—Government Land—A prodigious Slave System their Enemy—Victims of the Slave System—Premonitions on the Coming of Jesus—Demand by His Teachings for Absolute Equality, Page 437

CHAPTER XXI.

ROMANS AND GREEKS.

THE COUNTLESS COMMUNES.

UNIONS OF ROMANS AND GREEKS compared—Miscellaneous Societies of Tradesmen—Shipcarpenters—Boatmen—Vesselmakers—Millers—Organization of the Lupanarii—Of the Ancient Firemen—Description of the Greek Fraternities—The Eranoi and Thiasoi—Strange Mixture of Piety and Business—Trade Unions of Syria and North Palestine—Their Officers—Membership and Influence of Women—Large Numbers of Communes in the Islands of the Eastern Mediterranean—Their Organizations Known and Described From their Inscriptions. Page 444

CHAPTER XXII.

THE ANCIENT BANNER.

INCALCULABLY AGED FLAG OF LABOR.

THE OLD, Old Crimson Ensign—An Emblem of Peace and Good Will to Man—Strange Power of Human Habit—Descent of the Red Banner through Primitive Culture—White and Azure the Colors of Mythical Angels, Grandees and Aristocrats—Colors for the Lowly without Family, Souls or other Seraphic Attributes—How the Red Vexillum was Stolen from Labor—Tricks which Compromised Peace Tenets of the Flag—The Flag at the Dawn of Labor's Power—Testimony of Polybius—Of Livy—Of Plutarch—Causes of Working People's Affection for Red—The Emblem of Health and the Fruits of Toil—Ceres and Minerva their Protectresses and Mother-Goddesses Wore the Flaming Red—Emblem of Strength and Vitality—Archæology in Proof—Their Color First Borrowed from Crimson Sun-Beams—More Light and less Darkness—White and Pale Hues for the Priests—Origin of the Word "FLAG"—It is the Word-Root of "Flame" a Red Color—Proofs Quoted—Mediæval Banner in France and England—The Red of All Modern Flags Borrowed from that of the Ancient Unions—Disgraceful Ignorance of Modern Prejudice and Censure. Page 465

Evidence showing that the Early Christians were Members—Testimony of Philo—Of Eusebius—Facts Related by One of the Fathers—A Full Rendering—Numbers and Ways of the Secret Orders in and about Canaan at the Time of Christ—The Secret Order of Eranists—Inscriptions deciphered by Böckh and other Masters—Tertulian's Evidence—Community of Goods—The Eranistes and Thiasotes—Great Numbers of Secret Societies in Asia Minor and Syria. Page 276

CHAPTER XXIV.

CELEBRATED METHODS.

PLANTS OF THE ANCIENT BENEFACTORS.

SAVINGS OF PLATO; Of ARISTOTLE, Theophrastus, Xenophon, Demosthenes—Their Comparison with those of Jesus—Views of Social Life among the Ancients—Despotic Conditions—More of Concupiscence, Cupidity and Irascibility than Sympathy—Sympathy the Nursling of the Unions—How the Renowned Plan of Lycurgus Failed—Its Description—How it abetted Bondage and Suffering—Plans of Lycurgus and Jesus Compared—Plain Talk on Original Meanings—Plato's Celebrated "City of the Blessed" a Land of Masters and Slaves—A Labyrinth of worthless Statesmanship—Aristotle—His Mansion of Beatitudes—Political Castle built on the Sands of Aristocracy and Caste—Laborers Damned—The Stagerite and Jesus compared—Important comparative Hope in the Plan of Jesus as a Politico-Economic Basis of a Lasting Government—Spartan Government. Page 339.

CHAPTER XXV.

THE TRUE MESSIAH.

FOUNDERS OF GREAT INSTITUTIONS COMPARED

HOW THE REAL MESSIAH found Things at His Advent on Earth—Palestine—Syria—Rhodes and the Islands—Suffering Condition of Labor—Seeds of the Revolution already Sown—Further Analysis of the Conditions—The Eranoi and Thiasoi—Orgeons and Essenes—Falsehoods regarding the Bacchantes

CHAPTER XXIII.

PALESTINE;
HER PRE-CHRISTIAN COMMUNES.

CRADLE OF A Mighty Reform—Acquisitiveness and Concupiscence in open Conflict with Irascibility and Sympathy—A new Analysis of the Origin of the celebrated Movement in Judæa—Communes of Palestine—Boundaries between the Lowly of Phœnicia, Judæa, Greece and Rome, Unrecognized—Numbers of the Organized About the Cradle of the Savior—Difficulty of comprehending the true Import of the Judaic Idea in that Movement—Argument and Inscriptions Showing it to have been the Result of a long Line of Culture, Organization and Experiment. Page 493

THE ANCIENT LOWLY.

CHAPTER I.

TAINT OF LABOR.

TRAITS AND PECULIARITIES OF RACES.

GRIEVANCE of the Working Classes—The Competitive System among the Ancients—Growing Change of Taste in Readers of History—Inscriptions and Suppressed Fragments more recently becoming Incentives to Reflecting Readers who Seek them as a Means to secure Facts—No true Democracy—No primeval Middle Class known to the Aryan Family—The Taint of Labor an Inheritance through the Pagan Religion—Political Economy.

STUDENTS of history appear to be of three distinct classes: first, those who examine it to enjoy the stirring scenes of war and the exhibit that it makes of popular pageant, pomp and military genius; secondly, those who examine it with an object of gleaning facts regarding spiritual, ecclesiastical and other matters of religion; and lastly those who search for recounted deeds as well as clues to tenets of social movements among mankind. In this last, there has been an increasing interest since the beginning of the nineteenth century.

Among the precious obscurities sought by our generation are historical fragments, obscure hints and allusions and queer palæographs on tablets of bronze, stone, earthenware and other objects, containing inscriptions, symbols and emblems, even rules showing the existence of labor societies all through the past civilization. Especially is research quickened in the hearts of a certain class of antiquaries who are interested in the search of history, for its social phases.

It is evident from all clues obtainable that in the open world there has never existed a social government. Efforts have been made to prove that mankind at various intervals and at various points, once enjoyed conditions of life based so radically upon democratic laws as to resemble those now advocated; but such examples do not bear the test of rigid investigation. Although there have existed republics and paternal governments they have been so tinged with patrician leadership on the one hand and patriarchal dictatorship on the other, as to render it impossible to compare them with the socialism now advocated, where the lowly ascend and the lordly descend, to unite on a common level. The deep aim of these great struggles of our age known as the labor movement is to acquire and to enjoy complete and lasting co-operation. This co-operation, or brotherhood of life economies is expected to be not only political but economical, changing both the government and the methods of creating and dispensing the means of life, from the competitive into the purely democratic or co-operative. A practical adoption of this mutualism by any tribe or branch of the human family has probably never yet occurred and never has such a state of things existed except among those secretly organized, of whom we propose to treat.

All the evidences combine to prove that the only method societies have ever yet used, either in political or in economic life, is the competitive one; and as the change from the purely competitive into the purely co-operative involves little less than revolution, or to say the least, introversion, it becomes a study of gravest importance. In the remote past so meagre was the co-operative and so potent the competitive that there existed no intermediary classes and conflicts were common in consequence. Roscher thinks that middlemen are an indispensable element to peace; and it seems evident that his opinions are not without grounds, when applied to every stage of the competitive system in all known ages of the world.¹

¹ Principes d'Economie politique, Paris, 1857, pp. 175-6. "Tant qu'il existe entre les riches et les pauvres une classe intermédiaire considérable, l'influence morale qu'elle exerce suffit pour empêcher une collision."

Glimpses of evidence reward the researchers into the early history of the laboring masses by establishing the fact that there primarily existed no middle class. But we find great numbers of freedmen or plebeians as early as 700 years before Christ. Men were originally divided into lords and servants. There were masters and there were slaves. The chasm between these two was an empty pit so wide that no leap from one class to the other was considered either practicable or imaginable. As late as the sophists there appears a pronounced aversion to wage taking, especially in all business having for its object educational results. Plato abhorred a sophist who would work for wages. Public servants in the instruction of philosophy and other branches of what was then an ordinary education, were despised when they allowed themselves to belittle their manhood and their calling by this ignoble pay. Plato received gifts from the rich but refused pay. He was a patrician or peer. A statesman of to-day who receives gifts and is not content with his salary is regarded with distrust and aversion, almost equal to that against wages in ancient times. One can account for this metamorphosis of ethics only in the comparative absence in those days of labor among patricians or managers. Although free mercenary soldiers were common who took wages for their recompense, and free hucksters and other petty dealers were known to exist, yet most labor of cultivation, of building, of housekeeping and a considerable amount of the labor of mechanics was performed by slaves.

The law of Moses had partly abolished slavery among the Hebrews as early as B. C. 1400, probably on account of the contempt for that degradation which the Hebrews felt, after the deliverance from their protracted slavery in Egypt. It appears that the Hebrews were the chief originators and conservators of what is now known and advocated in the name of socialism; and their weird life, peculiar language, laws, struggles and inextinguishable nationality scintillate through many of the obscurities of history in a manner to command the wonder if not the awe of all lovers of democratic society. Especially does this remark apply when we consider the intensely and bitterly opposite character of every other community or nationality with which the Hebrew race has ever come in contact.

The Hebrew people were the Congregation and the place where they assembled was called the Tabernacle. The Pentateuch that records the great Jewish law, quite sufficiently explains that absolute liberty, or relative social equality was a law of Moses.² Under no other code of laws have equal rights of man with man been possible among other contemporaneous nations or tribes; because the ethics of the family, the city or state, were grounded upon the competitive rather than the co-operative or mutual principle.³ Nearly all the ancients were fighters. The Hebrew branch of the great Semitic family seems to have been a partial exception. It is true that they had wars and competed with outsiders; but their peace-loving traits within their own ranks, prevailed over warlike ones, probably somewhat as a result of their long captivity in Egypt, but principally from the peaceful and humane code of laws which they received from Moses. But it appears very certain that Jewish monotheism, together with the social or mutually protective habits of this people and their comparatively mild laws made them the object of hatred among the more competitive and consequently fiercer nations with whom they came in contact.

It is not then, from this Semitic branch of the human family that our struggling, warlike and competitive characteristics are derived. A close observation of the Hebrews discloses that although they were often engaged in strifes it was generally because attacked. The aggressiveness which characterizes mankind springs not from the Semitic so much as from the Aryan germ.⁴ Two distinct ideas have been contended for from the dimmest remoteness either of the provable or the conjectural history. One is the co-operative, which means the mutually protective or socialistic, the other the competitive or warlike and aggressive.

² Leviticus, xix. Mann's History of Ancient and Mediæval Republics, pp. 8-10.

³ Fustel de Coulanges. Cité Antique, Chap. I. Croyances sur l'ame et sur la mort.

⁴ The Phœnicians are excepted from this remark.

Through thousands of ages men have vigorously contended for these antipodal results, especially in Europe. They have contended for them through religious beliefs, through social inculcation and philosophy, through rigid scholastic training, and through the most implacable hatreds, bloody persecutions and race-wars ever recorded in the annals of mankind. Until we become better acquainted with the history of the poor classes and divest ourselves of clouds that have hitherto obscured the vision of all historians; until we study the past especially the somber life and strange career of the Semitic family, from a standpoint of development or evolution, and analyze their strangely tenacious and persistent views unbiased by the views through which we are still taught to regard others; until we can catch the practical advantages of co-operation, mutually one with another and thoroughly see the savage nature of competitive life, must we remain blind to the true object which inspired the greatest advent of this world;—the visit and labors at Palestine and the movement whose undying germs there planted the world still loves and cultivates.

These words are expressed preliminarily to announcing facts which have perhaps never before been observed and certainly never enough considered:—that the Aryan or Indo-European branch of the human race has always, in private and in public life, in religion, in social conventionalism, in methods of reasoning and in its political economy, been competitive, whilst the Semitic branch has ever been co-operative. For thousands of years these two great families have lived over against each other, sometimes mixed, sometimes by themselves, have struggled and fought, have built up and torn down, each with its own inexorably fixed notions; and never as we shall prove, did they show anything like a fusion or even a conciliation of the two systems until three hundred years after the death of Christ. They are warring still; and the direct causes of this warfare as well as its direct results are the great labor movements of today. We hope in these pages to show that the natural bent of the lowly majority of mankind is toward co-operation; that race hatreds ran so high that it became necessary to have an Intercessor or mediator to act between the two races and their two ideas, in order to bring about a mutually co-operative system under which the large majorities, including working people could better subsist. It became necessary to have this Intercessor not merely to arrange a religion based upon salvation of the soul or immortal principle, but more likely, as our train of evidence goes to prove, to introduce an organized method for the economic salvation of the downtrodden and realize practically the promised "Heaven on earth."

We mean by this that from the days of Moses, dating something above fourteen hundred years before Christ, there have existed two distinctly opposite sets of ideas or of thought upon which mankind—the arrogant blooded family with its competition on the one hand and the slave with his rebellions, and freedman with his formidable unions on the other—have been struggling to build up civilizations. The transition from a completely competitive to a mutually co-operative system involved complete revolution. The channels in which human thought has run since man has been a mere animal, occupying as the theory of evolution daringly asserts, a hundred thousand or more of years, have, except in the case of the persecuted and sometimes almost exterminated unions, been purely competitive.

The competitive is the oldest system known. It is profoundly aged. It is the system employed by all living beings by which to procure for individuals, each for itself and its species, the means wherewith to subsist. It is, without the least shadow of doubt, the original. It consists in methods of the individual, whether a weed, a tree, fox, reptile, hawk or human being, of subsisting, as an isolated creature or ego, independently of others. It has recognized self as uppermost and taken upon its own responsibility for others' sake their care only for gratification of self, as that manifested in preservation of species.

Back in the remote past, as reason began to dawn upon creeping cave-dwellers or troglodytes of our race, when thought was inspired by suspicion and methods of subsistence were based upon cunning, nature, in the vagueness of his understanding was full of terrors. As he began to realize the certainty of death, man established the first religion; but it was purely upon the competitive basis, always with this aristocratical ego uppermost.

Not until uncounted ages had passed, nor until this pagan religion was inconceivably old did another appear, arising from the mutually protective or co-operative idea. This was at so late a period that by groping back into the misty past, we are enabled to know its founder and trace its history. That it was an innovation, intolerably antithetical to this more aged, original competition or brute-force underlying and inspiring both business and religion is proved by the hatreds borne against it, which have so stamped themselves, not so much upon the religion as upon the whole race that kindled its flame, spoke its tongue and cherished its ideas.

The great struggle going on to-day seems best understood by the laborer.⁵ Persons brought up under the purely competitive system which governs human affairs, see with difficulty the idea of true socialism; but the Jews even of our day, grasp it with ease. We are at a loss to comprehend this. Why should the two founders of the labor party in Germany have arrived while young, at the same conception of a method which involves a revolution from the prevailing ideas of political economy? Marx and Lassalle had been born and educated under the Mosaic law. Ricardo, a Jewish speculator in stocks, was brought up in strict obedience to the Jewish law by his father; but finding the Hebrew doctrine very adverse to his speculative tendencies, notions of wages and political economy, he withdrew or seceded from his ancestral religion and joined the more numerous ranks of the competitive one.⁶

The Mosaic Law, divested of its idiosyncracies such as ⁵ See Prof. Ely's French and German Socialisms; Chap. xli. pp. 189-203; Lassalle's Allgemeiner Deutscher Arbeiter Verein. Ferdinand Lassalle and Karl Marx were Jews; and it is conjectured that their ease in comprehending the true theories of the working people emanated from their early training.

⁶ McCulloch, Introduction to The Life of Ricardo; London, 1876.

thirty-two hundred years ago, when men were simpler, were suitable enough, condensed into fair English, reads about as follows:

It is compulsory upon every man to stand in awe and obedience before father and mother and to keep the sabbath. Do not turn in favor of idols nor make molten gods for your worship. All sacrifice of a peace offering must be offered of your own free will, and eaten the same day and the next; for if any of it remain until the third, it must be burned as unhallowed and abominable.

When you reap the harvests of your land, leave some in the corners of the field and do not gather the gleanings of the harvest nor glean the vineyards. Leave something for the poor and the stranger.⁷ All stealing, false dealing and lying, one to another are forbidden. You must not swear by my name falsely nor profane it. You are forbidden to defraud or rob your neighbor. Pay without delay the wages agreed upon, to those whom you engage to labor for you. Never ill-treat the deaf nor put a stumbling block before the blind. Be careful and discreet in your judgment and your word of honor, treating neighbors with righteous equality. Never go about tale-bearing among the people, nor stir feuds with neighbors. To hate your brother is forbidden and to prevent him from falling into error you should call his attention to his fault. Abstain from revenges and grudges against the people and love your neighbor as yourself. Cultivate your stock after the natural law of selection. Let the seed of your fields be pure. Let your garments be un-mixed; if linen, let them be of pure linen; if wool, let them be all wool.

Then follow many details minutely describing what constitutes crime and what the punishment. Many of the punishments, while probably in very good keeping with an early and semi-barbarous age, appear to us brutal and distasteful in the extreme. The severe punishment of death,⁸ visited upon all who defiled the peculiar people by mixing their blood with Moloch,⁹ has gone far toward preserving the Hebrew stock from admixture with other races of mankind. The purity with which the Jews have thus maintained themselves amid vicissitudes, such as would have swallowed up and annihilated any other family of the human race, is readily pronounced one of the most remarkable phenomena encountered in the study of ethnology. The command is severe against witch, wizard and spirit-worship.¹⁰ This must be partly accounted for by the fact that the Egyptians, under whose domination the Jews had chafed for 400 years as slaves, were among the most superstitious in their belief in, and worship of all sorts of prestigation. Charms, incantations, witchcraft and all the sleights of the wand were so popular that the art was for ages interwoven with their religion. However much we may desire to ignore all mention of religion in this history of the ancient lowly, we find this impossible because of the prevalence of priest-power and dictum in political economy. The Hebrews were the only ancients who worshiped one deity,¹¹ and as that deity is represented to be the very one who dictated the law of Moses, he would naturally be severe against false gods. "I am a jealous God," is an expression often repeated in the bible;¹² and such a one in giving a code of laws for the government of men would scarcely do otherwise than make idolatry a crime. Immodesty also receives a full share of condemnation from the great Hebrew law, which thoroughly defines¹³ what constitutes unrefined or immodest actions.

⁷ Leviticus, xxiii. 22.

⁸ Leviticus. xx. 9. 7.

⁹ Leviticus, xxi. 14.

It is thus seen that a lofty spirit of chastity and of moral purity is inculcated into all the Mosaic law. There is nothing in it that binds the Jews to the practice of anything like close community of goods. The law of Moses is not communistical. Competitive methods then as now, were the reigning ones. But the law was mutually protective. The condition of society to-day is toned in a great measure by the practice of the demands of this aged code. Nearly all of the above cited paragraphs are now being obeyed by us; and they act alike, among Jew and

¹⁰ Leviticus, xx. 6. Witch hanging by our fore-fathers originates here.

¹¹ By this is meant; one animate, all-powerful being. Ancient Heliotry and other Pagan forms, most of which treated the working class with contempt and cruelty as we shall show, paid homage to inanimate, representative gods.

¹² Exodus, xx. 5.

¹³ Leviticus, xx. 17.

gentile, an effective part in keeping our civilization pure. The command¹⁴ that the people when harvesting their grain and grapes, should not forget those who are less fortunate, but should leave some for them, is a touching rebuke to the niggardly system of these more enlightened times. One remarkable habit, that of buying and selling, owning and profiting upon slaves, even of their own kindred,¹⁵ seems inconsistent and cannot again enter into practice. It also, to our critical understanding, brings into severe reproach and doubt the sacred or divine authorship of the law of Moses. Jesus rectified all this.

Most of the customs of the Hebrews are fixed. The same rules established in Palestine thirty-two hundred years ago are still adhered to. It is true that at that time Judæa was a farming or pastoral country; and that the Jews of to-day, having been separated by defeat and persecution, scattered and distributed to all portions of the world, cannot continue their original pastoral and agricultural vocations and so have become merchants and money lenders and have assumed the various methods of obtaining a living similarly to other people. It is also true that being thus isolated, having no country, and obliged to exist in the competitive world, under the competitive idea, they act among outsiders competitively.¹⁶ This they do; and they do it thoroughly.

¹⁴*Leviticus* xix. 9, 10. ¹⁵*Exodus* xxi. 2-8. Our object in bringing the Jewish question in here, is to arrange the groundwork before bringing forward the great movements of the lowly, enslaved working people, who, as will be seen, had not only their grievance but their distinct Plans of Salvation from trouble, which they for ages followed.

¹⁶See Millman, History of the Jews.

CHAPTER II.

THE INDO-EUROPEANS.

THEIR COMPETITIVE SYSTEM.

RELIGION and Politics of the Indo-Europeans Identical—Reason for Religion mixing with Movements of Labor—The father the Original Slaveholder—His Children the Original Slaves—Both the Law and Religion empowered him to Kill them—Work of Conscience in the Labor Problem, HISTORY began to register facts and to throw its earliest light on the actions of the human race about the time that slavery began to take its leave. But enough of the slave system always remained to cast its dark shadows upon life. There had, previously to the historic record and ages before the breaking up of slavery, been an immense¹ an immeasurable period of time through whose trackless swamps humanity had trod; for the weak, uncertain story of a once happy reign of Neptune,¹ we are forced to ignore for want of evidence. When we reflect that there were freedmen or emancipated slaves two thousand years before the beginning of the Christian era, and that consequently the laboring classes have been struggling for four thousand years, writhing out from their slave fetters without having yet fully succeeded, we may at least establish a basis of conjecture as to the time it required for the laboring denizens of the ancient slave system to grow to a conception of manhood and womanhood, sufficient to break their first bonds. Of the purely slave epoch which preceded the art of annals we have little but conjecture. There must have been a comparatively high civilization at the dawn of manumissions, where history and archæology find human society and begin gracefully to transmit to us its deeds. An inconceivable space of time must have intervened. Let us attempt to make history for the laboring classes from conjectural data in order to connect the link binding the known with those dark abysses of the unknown in antiquity.

¹Plato says (Laws, iv. 6, Bekk., L. ed.), that a great while before cities were ever built, as is told, and during the reign of Saturn, there existed a certain extremely happy mode of government to regulate the dwelling of men.... It had all things unrestrained, yielding spontaneously.... It was governed by Dæmons of a diviner, more perfect race. Plutarch (Numa Pompilius), also speaks of such a time and states that Numa desired to bring back those happy days to men. Plutarch (De Definitione Oraculorum 18.), also says that Saturn slept on an island of the blessed. But it was in ancient Italy, Cf. Dionysius of Halicarnassus, (Antiquitates Romanæ, i., 34.), that the mythical Saturn and Janus chained down the god of war and closed the temples against belligerency and want. The conclusion, after all our research is, that the whole story is a myth based upon the well known longings which gave shape to thousands of Utopias and Messiahs.

The supposed original cradle of the Aryan family from which comes the Caucasian or Indo-European type, is Central Asia. Greeks and Romans were Aryan Europeans, Jews or Hebrews, and Phœnicians, the Semitic family. We have already seen that the Jewish race, especially the Jews, were an imperfect and unsatisfactory form of civilization in place of the Pagan or purely Aryan basis upon which to build their civilization. The Aryans, especially the Greeks, on the contrary, built their society upon the extreme competitive idea. It was not mutual, interacting, loving, charitable and non-destructive; the other was selfishly egoistic, combative and destructive. The Greeks, however, were lofty, intelligent, capable and susceptible of development of physical type and of culture far more than any other branches of the human race.¹

It appears from all the evidences that the first form of society was that of masters and slaves.² The extreme

¹ Under the ancient idea, religion which governed political as well as private habits, was exclusively based upon man-worship. Zeus or Jupiter was a man god. Demons or Læres were dead men, imagined, all through Pagan times to be still influential for good or evil. Cf. Pausanias, Descriptio Græciæ, v. 14. At Olympia the first two prayers were offered at the local fire, always burning in honor of these dead men and of Zeus.

² G. de Cassagnac, Histoire des Classes Ouvrières et des Classes Bourgeoises, Chap. III, iv. v.

lowliness of the laboring man's condition at that remote period can easily be imagined when we consider that all the children of the aristocratic household except the oldest son born of the real wife and legal mother, were totally unrecognized by law. All except this heir, were originally slaves. In fact this was the origin of slavery. The first human law was, long before being written, a law of entailment upon primogeniture. When the patrician or owner of the property, which in those times, mostly consisted of lands died, the property did not fall to the children or by testament, as is now the case. It fell to the oldest male child. No other person of that household had any claim upon it. The deceased father may have had many other children, but these became subjects to the manor; and frequently they were very numerous.⁴

This eldest son and inheritor was, by usage of that day, obliged to bury his father within the house, or court and worship him as a god. The original workingman was not even a citizen.⁵ There is no lack of testimony regarding this curious custom which was really the religion and the rule or groundwork upon which stood the ancient competitive regulation of labor. Let us now trace this new family in order to get at the origin and perpetuation of human slavery.

There being in primitive ages no power as now exists, behind this new heir and administrator or despot of the paternity, he easily becomes an absolute lord or monarch. To make this unjust and wonderful civilization appear more comprehensible and home-like, we may assume familiar names. A rich farmer, one who has inherited his property from his father, dies, leaving many children, ⁴Fustel de Coulange, Cité Antique, c. vii. pp. 76—89 Droit de Succession. Granier, Hist. des Classes Ouvrières, p. 69: "Ainsi, nous pouvons dire maintenant que nous avons trouvé les premiers esclaves qui furent; c'étaient les enfants." As to the great numbers in families, see Iliad, XXIV. v. 495. 6. 7:

Πεντήκοντά μοι ἦσαν, ὅτ' ἤλυθον νῆες Ἀχαιῶν
Ἐννεακαίδεκα μὲν μοι ἱὲς ἐκ νηδύος ἦσαν,
Τόους ἄλλους μοι ἐτίκτον ἐνὶ μεγάροισι γυναῖκες.

So also Plutarch, Theseus, 3, says that Pallas had 50 children. Gideon had 70, according to Josephus, Antiquities of the Jews, Book V. Chapter ix. Apson had 60; Jair 80 children.

⁵Bücher, Aufstände der unfreien Arbeiter, S. 11. "Der beste (antike) Staat schliesst die Arbeiter vom Bürgerrechte aus; und wo sie dasselbe erhalten konnten, blieben sie stets eine misachtete und einflusslose Klasse."

boys and girls. There may be several daughters senior to his oldest son. This latter, however, because the first-born male, comes into sole possession of the paternal estate. The girls are of a sympathetic, unsuspecting nature and being also less physically powerful, they make little or no resistance. The boys are young; and being in this tender age are, after a certain amount of struggle, in shape of battles, with words and other weapons, also compelled to yield. This bully moreover to accomplish his purpose, also draws upon the superstition of the unfortunate children and hides the wickedness of his avarice behind the sanctuary of religious rites over their dead father who practiced the same cunning, force and craft before. The bully thus originated the great law of entailment upon primogeniture, and has never once loosened his grip to this day.

To resume our home-drawn, practical illustration of the origin of this ancient law of usurpation, it may be said, that not a penny can possibly fall to one of the many sisters and brothers thus cast out, although they had contributed their labor toward the creation of the estate. He becomes the supreme ruler over the property. By virtue of the arrogant law of primogeniture, ancient and hallowed as the adoration of the vestal fires, this unique successor becomes, without formality, the monarch. But his possessorship is not confined to the ownership of the real estate of the paternity. He also owns the stock and fixtures thereto belonging. Among the rest of the stock and fixtures are the brothers and sisters; both those who are pure, or born of his own mother whose character and chastity, especially in ancient times, were always beyond reproach, and also those more numerous children otherwise born.⁶ These all fall to him also, as part of the inheritance! He is monarch absolute.⁷ He has become a pater familias; and as such, has the power of his father before him. No law exists that can restrict his will.

⁶In ancient days, as shown in note 4, they were often very numerous. For the law giving license to concubinage, see Gaius, Twelve Tables.

⁷Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Archæologia Romana, or Roman Antiquities, liber II. cap. 25; Seven Essays on Ancient Greece, Oxford. 1832, p. 52: "The state gave parents the power, atrocious and unnatural, to kill them; he—the father—could refuse to preserve and rear his own offspring." See likewise Aristotle, Politics, 4.

He cannot liberate his poor slaves;—for it is an assumed episode in prehistoric conditions that we are describing; it antedates the era of manumissions, although the same wrongs existed long afterwards. But he can punish his own slaves—his brother, sister or his child, with death. He can sell them. He can whip them and impose upon them the most cruel of tortures. Tiger or lamb is his option.

His religion is as aristocratical, as brutal and exclusive as his economic and social policy. Unlike the mild democracy infused into the worship of present civilizations, his religion cannot tolerate even the thought that all may do homage at a common shrine or adore a common Father. To allow this would be to cancel the distinction between master and slave.⁸ The father of this autocrat, buried under the hearthstone, has himself become the only god whom this man may worship. Thus every nerve is active in perpetuating, glorifying and rendering aristocratic and lordly the prestige of his house.⁹ The sacred altar is his father's grave over which is kept a fire that is never allowed to be extinguished.¹⁰ His own father thus becomes his tutelary god and guardian, watching, like a veritable spook, with a jealous eye over his interests. Should this sacred fire be extinguished, the accident is punished with an ignominious death.¹¹ This parent-god, like the man when walking on this earth, is believed to be subject to hunger and thirst. He must consequently be fed with actual food; with bread and wine, butter, honey and the purest delicacies of the table. If this be neglected, the propitious smiles and favors which

⁸ Fustel de Coulanges, Cité Antique, chap. iv. p. 33. Here this student explains the Pagan mode of sacrifice, including the whimsical old superstition of the Lares, or the remains of said parent after burial, to which this living heir gave offerings of food, such as milk, clarified butter, wine ect.

⁹ In Greek, this altar was called Βωμός and Ἑστία; in Latin, Ara, Focus—the focus of all thoughts, prayer, moral concern; the shrine.

¹⁰ This statement is not absolutely exact; for the fires were, on certain rare occasions, renovated. See Fustel, Cité Antique, p. 23, Feu sacré.

¹¹ Centuries afterwards, when there had become many such aristocratic houses, such masters as were friendly with each other, found it necessary for mutual protection largely from the wrath of these very outcasts, to form a city of aristocratic houses. A central city-altar or focus was adopted, a central city-fire kindled and a Vigil or maiden watcher was stationed, to keep its fires glowing forever. Punishment of a most horrible death was inflicted upon her for letting these sacred fires die out.

prayer invokes, are turned, by the slighted and angry ghost against the perpetrators of the negligence. The law of agnation or descent in the male line, rules severely in this family; and consequently the female portions of it are the especial objects of the master's power. The lord himself being supreme, may commit acts of libertinism such as would consign others to the punishment of death. Should his wife, the mater familias, vary from the rules of family regularity, it would place in doubt the descent of the paternity. It would cause it to become a question whether her first-born son, the inheritor, were really his own and of the pure blood—the agnate. Should the deception be so veiled as to escape the master's knowledge, there yet remains a still more terrible source of disclosure. The buried gods themselves, omnipotent and omniscient, jealous and disturbed, feeling the dignity of their noble line defiled,¹³ their august prerogatives encroached upon by a pretender who might in turn at death usurp the beatitudes of the *penates*¹³ and the holy altar, are aroused. Conscience in the guilty mother becomes too galling to permit of life's longer endurance and death must be the consequence after the confession, and the error rectified by the destruction of the intruder. Here is the key to that extraordinary tenacity of ancient ladies in wedlock with the noble or gens families, to virtue.¹⁴ The Lares, or redoubtable ghosts, are, as we now begin to understand, charged with the office of chastizing such criminals; also of watching all the thoughts, words and deeds going on in the sacred penetralia—penates—of the living lord's household. So egotistical and selfish is this religious culture that none but the family can pray at that altar and no one can be prayed for except members who have been in high standing. A thing so degraded as a being compelled to subsist by labor has no place there, no family, no shrine. Family initiation made it worse.

But we have only entered upon the description of this despot. His most revolting attributes are yet to be put into history. All the creatures of his household, with the exception of the noble mother and her first-born male child, are slaves.¹⁵ They may be, as we have said, brothers and sisters, or even children born to amorous coercion¹⁶ of this thus privileged despot; yet they have no claim to anything but his sympathies. Having no legalized rights they are menials; left without education they become sycophantic and unmanly. Their food is coarse. Only the lord and lady of the house are entitled to wheat bread. They are glad to get peas and second-rate bread.¹⁷ Should too many infants be born, a council is called and it is deliberated whether the little innocents shall be saved or killed.¹⁸ The children being slaves, are not supposed to be supplied with a thing so dignifying as a soul.¹⁹ The most abject superstition reigns. For a slave or a stranger to enter the apartments of this lord, is an offense, impious and unpardonable. The lord's own parents and ancestors before them for generations back, are buried under this enclosure soul and body; and their jealous manes or ghosts,²⁰ are believed to be omnipresent and on guard, with power to repel or punish the sacrilege. The manor house is situated within the holy court. The common slaves and the children constituting the true laboring element, are taught the most extreme reverence. Should they violate any of the rigorous rules they are subject to punishment; if the lord of the manor wills it, with death. Thus deep superstition, hard, unpaid labor, hard fare and degradation are enforced by the cunning wiles of priestcraft; for love of profits from labor seems to originate or urge ancient priest-power. This superstition is the more necessarily rigorous, since lack of faith is known to be dangerous, leading to sedition and rebellion.

¹³ From this may be traced the origin of blood-distinctions still boasted of and tenaciously cultivated; in dynasties, as divine right; in families, as prestige. The horror against this sin was inexpressible; and a liason with one of the outcasts rendered the crime trebly heinous.

¹⁴ See Livy's Lay of Lucretia.

¹⁴ Plutarch, Questiones Romanas, 51.

¹⁵ Fustel de Coulanges, Cité Antique, I. c. i.-iv. Antiques Croyances. From these phenomena of the ancient family may be traced the origin of the belief in ghosts, spooks, spectres, haunted abodes etc.; idem, pp. 127-30.

¹⁶ Plutarch, Solon, xiii. ¹⁷ Horace, Epistolæ, lib. II. Epist. I. v. 128: "Vivit siliquis et pane secundo." Poor fare for labor continued late. Of course, where much harmony and love existed the despot could be generous.

¹⁸ This practice held good among the Dorians even after Greeks began to acquire the art of making historical records. See Plutarch, Lycurgus, xvi.

¹⁹ Homer, Odyssey, lib. XVII. The passage here alluded to refers to a comparatively enlightened period. As late as Plato, when emancipations and resistance had created a middle class, it was doubted whether working-people had all of the attributes recognized in true members of the human family. Cf. Plato, Rep. vi. 9; lxxi. Laws, vi; Homer, Odyssey, xvii. 382. Plato wanted slaves and believed in the inferiority of all laborers.

²⁰ Cicero, Pro Domo; Tusculanarum Disputationum Libri, I. 16: "Sub terra censebant reliquam vitam agi mortuorum." Enri. I les, Alcestis, 163; Hecuba.

The lord of the estate permits of no social or religious mixtures with other people or other estates. There are no tenants, no neighbors, and consequently few sociabilities. Egoism is so severe that little of the kind can be tolerated. It is master and slave; no intermediaries. Communities are unknown. Promiscuity which makes the village,²¹ the community, the social gathering, the free sports of children and general merriment are interdicted by this profound solemnity based upon an adoration of, and implicit obedience in one central ruler; a man who is the inheritor; who, by virtue of this inheritance giving him power, and of this egoism giving him will, assumes, as through the countless ages his ancestors assumed, to be the sole owner in life, and the immortal to be worshiped, caressed, entreated, propitiated, glorified, after death!²²

We have thus described, as if actually existing among us at present, a scene whose stage was once this earth;²³ whose unhappy actors were workingmen and women and whose managers were then as now, the capitalists; a scene which mankind, grace to an eternal resistance, in turmoils, servile wars, and innumerable social communes, has largely outgrown. It is a scene which no civilized society could at present tolerate. Yet it was the almost all-prevailing one among mankind of the distant past in Greece and Italy.

Lordship, therefore, was the very first condition in the establishment of society; slavery its antithesis, the second. Of the middle class occupying the great gap widely separating the lord from the slave there was none.

²¹ The ancient house was situated within the sacred enclosure. This enclosure was divided, among the Greeks, into two parts; the first being the court. The house was in the second part. The sacred focus was placed near the center of the enclosure. It was consequently at the foot of the court, near the entrance of the house. The Romans had it differently, though essentially the same. The focus remained, as in Greece, in the center of the enclosure, but the buildings were placed around it leaving an inner court; the walls of the houses rising around it on all sides. The Greeks used to say that religion taught them how to build houses. Fustel de Coulanges, Cité Antique, pp. 62-85.

²² In Greek the ἐστία δεσποία, in Latin the Lar familiaris, were key-words of the ancient pagan family. Etymologically this is the origin of the term despot.

²³ We have not space to make copious quotations from the numerous authors whose descriptions and hints we have ransacked in search of the proof of this condition of ancient affairs; but recommend the doubtful to the following commentators and original writers: Granier de Cassagnac, Histoire des Classes Ouvrières &c. Chapters III. IV. V. De Coulanges, Cité Antique, passim; to the poems of Homer; to almost any of the voluminous works of Cicero; to the Orationes of Demosthenes; to Orelli's Inscriptionum Collectio; to Böckh's Corpus Inscriptionum Græcarum; to Euripides, Alcestis and especially Hecuba, passim; to Plato's Creation, Protag. 30-4, Theæt. 30-2, Rep. 21; to Pausanias, Descriptio Græciæ; to Macrobius, Somnium Scipionis & Saturnaliorum Libri and many others.

That came later. For fully six thousand years it has been growing more and more numerous until in the nineteenth century it may be said to have almost filled the great cavity and is now pressing in all directions to force the extinction of both those aged originals.

Theoretically, this middle or intermediary class betwixt lord and menial, owner and outcast, immortal and perishable, is perfect; occupying the ambrosial vales of Utopia where men are no longer struggling for existence against despotism, ignorance and death. In theory we should suppose it an altruistic state in which men looking upward to wisdom and mutual love, and backward to past ignorance and competitive greed and hatreds, would erect their society and their government upon a plan wherein neither lords nor menials could have law or foothold. Such would be the revolution realized—the revolution that began with manumissions. But practically—although many are dreaming of this ultimatum—we are far from it. Lords still exist though with milder domination and slaves yet remain though on a higher plain.

M. de Laveleye informs us that communities held lands in common for the people in times past²⁴ and cites an abundance of instances in proof; but while this may all be true, it is none the less true that the original condition was that of masters and slaves. Particularly was this the case with the people from whose records we extract these data—the Aryan race. It is the perfectly natural condition, explainable in the theory of development. In the Aryan, especially its Indo-European type, we see the original theory of development verified; and it comes to us from prehistoric data which philology, archæology and reason harmoniously combine to verify. What would man, primitively a wild animal, naturally do? Would he not be just like all animals? It wants only the observation of an hour to note that a group of barnyard fowls, soon after being put into a yard begin fighting for mastery or lordship; and this conflict will not stop until the strongest, cleverest chanticleer has mastered every adversary. This also must be said of a herd of cattle grazing on a common. The strongest steer, after a full test of its muscular forces, becomes master of the flock and remains so. With perfect truth it might be further remarked that should no individual of the herd be of the male gender, the contest for mastery will be between the heifers; thus seeming to prove the principle of the survival of the fittest without any reference to the instinct of perpetuation of species. Even plants, in their struggle for existence are constantly in the competitive field, warring with each other—the tares rooting out the wheat—until the hand of the reasoning cultivator lays low the obnoxious weeds. Thus it is shown that the principle of individual ascendancy with its acknowledgement, is the original and natural one. It is the quiritare dominium. The law of natural selections and survival of the fittest applies without the aid of reason. Naturalists who have lavished great care and honest pains in search of proof of this philosophy in plants, animals and men,²⁵ have scarcely brought their investigations to bear upon that new, almost supernal power of reason, which some admit to have come later, as a result of evolution.

²⁴ De Laveleye, Primitive Property, pp. 137. In attempting to prove these notions about primitive property, this author is confronted at the outset, with the fact that he is seeking to rebut the principle of development; his village communities are a late, not a “primitive” condition.

If we are allowed to tread the penetralia of this philosophy with the eye and ear of a critic we shall find in the law of natural selections the bed rock of brute competition. While beholding this with the conviction of its truth and forced to admit it as the fiat of growth, we shall see that it rests upon the toppling trestles of brute force. We shall find that the superstructure resting upon these abutments is time-worn and rotten. Its spans are becoming unsafe; its planking hoof-worn; its stringers sway with the winds of newer things and we find ourselves dizzy peering into the angry foam of progress below. As long as there are only masters and slaves the strongest brutes may survive; but when the new idea of manumission arrived which was forced upon the masters by the growth of population, the survival of the fittest changed hands. If we accept the doctrine of natural selection based upon brute force we accept the survival of the fittest as its corollary. So long as the doctrine is so based it remains undeniably true. Reason is not there.

²⁵ We here incorrectly place man above animals in deference to the egoism he has not outgrown. Especially is man to be considered and classed among animals under the philosophy of the fittest, since this very survival is mostly the result of the competitive struggle, akin to brute force and antedating the milder forces of reason.

But with the advent of reason there came also sympathy, civilization, enlightenment; and these have already so filled the world with mutual or altruistic sentiment that the working classes of both Europe and America are now combining with a determination to drive from the world the whole brute force upon which the old theory is based. They will not longer hear to the competitive principle which holds up the shrewdest and strongest as fittest to survive. They demand the extinction of competitive force and insist upon equal opportunities for co-operation such as will result in the survival of all. They are thus ushering in the era of reason. In disenthraling their species from the competitive system of the isolated individual and establishing them on the co-operative or altruistic system they procure the revolution. They usher in the era of the survival of all and banish from the world the culture of darlings, the reign of partiality, the prestige of masters and the servility of slaves. But as force lies at the bottom of the law of natural selections and the survival of the fittest, so reason, its moral antithesis, must be the bottom rock upon which the new mutualism is founded.

We cannot leave this theoretical dissertation without some reflections upon the ghastly immorality and the return to insatiate selfishness which this new philosophy of the survival of the fittest inculcates; and must submit that it not only logically inculcates an arid dreariness of words, but has already produced and is producing withering and demoralizing effects. We shall submit that the religion of Jesus, planted by a manual laborer and forming the basis of hope upon which stands the great labor movement of our own time has been severely attacked, stamped as a calamity and trodden under foot, notwithstanding the fact that this plan of faith has been the power that openly struck the first well organized blow at the system of masters and slaves and boldly championed it as a principle; and in essence it has never since shrunk from its prodigious task toward realizing the much contested doctrine of human equality.

Viewed from a standpoint of mere comparative strength of organized muscle and brain, or of the low cunning and prowess which wrench from the weak and unwary what they do not contribute to produce, this theory of survival is undeniably logical. But these forces are the old, original ones and strictly belong to a period prior to the advent of a society enlightened and refined by reason. They are animal and are of the ages of bullies and of clubs. Why we confront such theorists is that this philosophy does not keep march with the very power that gives them insight into it—reason. The original state was egotistical, with brutal force—forcible possession. The next was arbitration, discussion, conciliation—all the struggles of reason. The former occupied an immense, unmeasured period of time, the latter has also had its vista of tedious, unhappy ages; for since the first glimmerings of history and archæology it has numbered between four and five thousand years and its millennium is still far away. It is the transition period; the passage from pure brute force and labor ordered by masters and performed by slaves with survival of the fittest, to the pure era of reason, mutual love and mutual care, with the survival of all. Such is the revolution.

Whoever, therefore, at this enlightened day, forgetting his reason, the very weapon he wields with which to grasp his inspirations, allows this aged original, because it is yet true of the beast or the plant, to usurp the domain of reason self-won in the struggle of ages,²⁶ returns to the dogma that because the survival of the fittest has been true of snarling beasts, of the plants and of the club-and-weapon age of men, it is also true of men in a state of reason and refinement, is going backward dragging reason with him into the caves of the troglodyte.

Let us glance at the moral effect upon the mind, of persons in search of wealth and other means of happiness natural to our lot in the competitive world. A student of evolution is constrained by perusing the pages of Lucre-

²⁶ Mr. Darwin, a thoughtful and thoroughly careful writer refrained from pushing his argument on this subject farther than it applies to energy without reason. A careful student of Darwin will perceive that he always uses the lower order of life as proof; such as plants, birds, fishes, and the other animals. He clings to this, not venturing into the domain of the reasoning power, which is alone capable to grasp the labor problem.

tius, Vogt, Spencer, Darwin and others, to view man as a creature without an immortal soul. Through the doctrine of development as explained by Darwin, men are taught to understand this perishability merely as a logical corollary of the premise itself.³⁷ The theory carries with it the irrepressible deduction that if man has an immortal soul he has, himself, been the maker of it. The theory from the first, assumes that he is a creature grown from a long line of consequents, each an effect of causes natural to this world. This is evolution. It holds that motion and heat acting upon the material spread out upon this earth will of themselves, generate life; and that from cells or matrices of slime it calls protoplasm—the assumed earliest forms of life—come shape, growth and variety, some of which in time have reached as high a development as reasoning men. Nor are these ideas confined to, or the work of, the benighted and superstitious. They are gaining ground among the most thoroughly respectable and learned; so much so that it is already dangerous for the followers of the old belief upheld by Plato and Moses, to criticize or compare arguments against the ponderous weight and increasing multiplicity of proof in its support. So irrefutable is the evidence which our indefatigable diggers in science have accumulated, that from the timorous lisps of a few years ago it has become a creed for the army of science; and is claimed by naturalists, by comparative philologists and historiographers, by archæologists and others in the field of ethnical research, to be the key of the new discovery.

What then can science do for the immortal soul? Man, certainly, away back in that night of time of which we are going to write a history, while yet an aminal and brute, a homo troglodyticus, not yet knowing how to build a fire or hardly to wield a club, could not have possessed so noble and highly developed a thing as an immortal soul! Or if we can conceive this to be possible, what shall we think of him during the still earlier cycles of his existence in forms yet cruder and more remote? Further than this we may in our play of fancy measure him at the dawn of his development of reason, which is a faculty higher but less unerring than instinct. Reason is a gift which must be guided by social laws. Not having these, man must have been a maniac; either thus, or he preserved enough of instinct to guide reason. The reason of a madman turns to cunning.²⁸ Cunning, we are told, is the weapon this ferocious, selfish, competing, primeval being first used to work his title clear to the realms of immortality!

³⁷ In making these reflections we do not set up a disclaimer against the theory of development. The object is to show the pernicious effect upon the mind of masses, should this theory become universally acknowledged, and taught, before the competitive system is superseded by the co-operative or socialistic.

Thus in reading rare records of the ancient lowly we cannot be too thoughtful or too careful when contemplating the subject of immortality. Though old in life's ephemeral span, the human race is still in the dawn of its day; and the sun has yet to rise higher and illumine many a still dark chasm of our belief. The great aphorism of Lucretius:

"Proinde licet quotvis vivo?o condere sæcla:
Mors æterna tamen nilo minus illa manebat,"²⁹ though it has been parried and fought in darkness, is like that Proudhon:—"La propriété c'est le vol," still respectable; and so long as our standard cyclopedias speak of the Rerum Natura of Lucretius as the "greatest of didactic poems"³⁰ even now, when the grand sun of man's morning of life has lit up all the grottoes but that of fate and rendered radiant many a dark belief, just so long is it wisest in us to withdraw cavil, polemic and concern from a post mortem future and throw our whole religion into practical doings for the improvement of ourselves upon the mortal stage. But most especially are these words wise counsel to all engaged in a study of the labor problem.

Such is this wonderful man, says the theorist, developed from a protoplasm of slimy earth. Then up to this stage he was without a soul—an animal. He further developed to the stage of reason—mind. Cunning must then have secured for him the boon of an immortal soul; a thing which most people agree in believing that the reasonless animals do not possess!

²⁸ Plato, Laws, vii. 14. "The boy, without being fitted by education, becomes crafty and cunning and of all wild beasts the most insolent." Plato knew the fierce nature of men and his seventh book of laws is a thoughtful code of precepts for equalizing habits among the people, and punishing with means in use for doing so. Plato even doubts the possibility of a soul in such wild creatures.

²⁹ Lucretius, De Rerum Natura, lib. III. 1088-9.

³⁰ American Cyclopædia, vol. X. p. 717, ed. of 1867.

This sort of speculation may appear quite innocent, even popular; for such is the freedom of thought in these days that men delight in catching at the gossamers of skepticism. Where the danger to the moral sense arises on this new philosophy, is in the fact that the revolution is not yet realized. The world is still in its competitive stage. Man is still combating with his blind egoism in the struggle for existence. It is not altruism or mutual love and care that governs his career. He is yet fighting against odds for survival; and if his fitness to win the means of life prove insufficient he does not survive, but perishes. Knowing this, he is too ready to apply his reason in the direction of selfishly actuated cunning, and thus wring out a living recklessly. One thing however, has always barred him from the exercise of dishonest cunning. It is conscience. From the earliest data we find man building upon conscience as the foundation of ethics. As we have shown, it began with the mother's virtue. True, it was absurdly imaginative, figuring the rage of the lar familiaris in case that weird omnipotent was offended by an evil deed of the living. Thus to commit an evil deed used to cause conscience to fill the imaginations of men with horrid appearances rising from the grave. Goblins and spectres of a thousand shapes. Elfin and haunting terrors appeared. Conscience was thus the origin of ghosts. Conscience, even under the most aristocratic and tyrannical religion, held base actions in check. Under the prevailing religions of the world conscience at this day holds evil doing in check. Ethics is now, as in ancient times, based upon conscience. All laws are largely the outcome of it. It is the inner counselor of outward actions and conscience of the individual must never give up its scepter so long as the competitive, egotistical state dominates. When the revolution has been accomplished, when society shall have arranged the getting of the means of life on the mutual or co-operative plan, when it shall no longer be the survival of the fittest but the survival of all, when it no longer becomes necessary to fight in the cruel, dreary old field of competition and the struggle for existence ceases, then we may find some vague grounds for imagining ourselves no longer compelled to apply the check of conscience; since wrong doing will have lost its incentive.

But now, in the height of the great competitive struggle when working people, goaded at the sight of their own labor products falling into the rapacious hands of monopolies, are again on the rally and are forming the most compact and extensive organizations that have yet existed; just at this moment when the restraining counsels of conscience are most needed to check and withhold what else may become mobocracy, with results more furious and sanguinary than the deeds of Eunus and Cleon or of Spartacus and Crixius which we are going to relate, and at the very moment the moral world seems riven and quails before the swelling legions of aggrieved labor organizing in the struggle for existence with the multifold weapons of an advanced enlightenment at their command, what do we see?

A new thing in the world. A stranger in form of a philosophy which denies the immortality of the soul. A codex which seeks its precedents back of religion or law, beckoning into the world a totally new scheme of dialectics. In denying the old belief in immortality it stamps the ancient conscience;²¹ for what further use has ethics or morality for conscience, after the cherished hope of earning some longed-for compensation in the hereafter, has been lost?

The only conscience left to man would be that based on cunning! This invites him back to the law of Lycurgus, which made stealing a virtue but being caught, a crime. Conscience the foundation rock of religion, ancient and modern, is ground to powder by this new giant philosophy²² whose arguments seem fortified by the chemist, the archæologist, the comparative philologist, the palæontologist, the geologist and all naturalists now devoting themselves to labors which are to prepare for a study of ethnical science. The boldest of these claim, as we have shown, that when in the long course of evolution, man, then a brute but with a stature more erect and a cranial organism more capacious than other creatures with which the forest teemed, began to experience the first scintillations of reason, he exercised this new and growing gift for his own advantage and to secure his own personal survival; sacrificing all others for himself through prowess and strategem or cunning. Conscience came later and established ethics which has developed society, law and order and kept him somewhat restrained. Religion is the handmaid of conscience and both groped together up to the present time inseparable—neither able to exist without the other.

²¹ We refer mostly to that moral side of conscience which has hitherto so powerfully actuated and restrained men by force of belief in awards and punishments.

²² Arnobius was in great doubt on the question of immortality. Lucretius, author of the celebrated didactic poem on nature, believed that the soul perishes with the body. Aristotle, now known as the greatest of teachers, could never promise anything to those inquiring of him on the problem of immortality. Darwin was equally silent on the subject.

Thus the new philosophy finds man. Religion rests upon assumed immortality; conscience upon religion. The philosophy, by proving that belief in immortality is an illusion, that the soul is an etherial delusion, that with the decease of body comes our eternal quietus, proves also that there is no religion. The great bulwark of humanity; moral law, order, hope, restraint, is annihilated at one stroke. Conscience, resting upon religion,³³ is also shattered with it, and man goes back to his primeval cunning and brutal instincts.

Now, in coloring our description of the revolution in a history of the lowly, let us select an average workingman who has been converted to the new philosophy as thousands are—and picture the effect upon him as an agitator of the labor question.

Belief in the doctrine of development is belief either that man is without an immortal spirit or that through his own genius and cunning he has evolved or developed one out of his original beasthood, independently of an almighty power. The latter is not even pretended. Consequently immortality is denied. The belief also stamps out religious conscience; leaving in him the consciousness that, as there is no responsibility before God—there being none except insentient law which regulates the universe, the only thing to consider before the commission of a deed, is caution, for safety's sake; first that the act may not recoil upon himself, and second, that he be not caught in it and discovered. These are affairs of cold reason. Conscience with its compunctious concomitants, is ruled out of the affair; and rigid experimental knowledge, aptitude, tact, adaptiveness take its place. No matter how horrible the work to be undertaken, he is totally absolved from danger of punishment if cunning enough to elude the natural and the statute laws and succeed. With cold reason and in cold blood he fearlessly undertakes the deed, knowing that to succeed is to survive his victim and be happy.

³³ Conscience resting on punishments and rewards for actions in the physical world, as effects of causes, is not here taken into consideration.

Lions, dogs, wolves, hyenas, vultures are constantly doing this for they are in the world of competition and have no conscience; and he is not a whit above them morally. Had he the restraint of religious conscience in the same field of competition, he would be lifted by it above these brutes. It teaches him the survival of the fittest and inflates his egotism with presumption that he is superior to his victim. It thus unhinges the little enlightenment which mutual co-operation and social interaction have by great agonies of effort and with the labors of conscience, sympathy and belief in immortality, brought into the world. Does it indeed, threaten our civilization?

One will say this shocking description may apply to the workingman; but we think it too often applies practically to the most educated. It especially applies to them; for such revolting immorality seldom penetrates the ranks of laborers who from remote ages of the past have been religiously inclined and rather prejudiced in favor of religion. No tale of ancient labor can ignore its religion.

But admitting the workingman, and agitator to have become a convert to this philosophy, we still have the same revolting consequences. Such consequences are now constantly transpiring. The present century is producing some reformers who are believers in the doctrine of development and are scoffers of religion. Few of them expect to live beyond their grave. Many have no conscience regarding a future punishment and are too honest in their earnestness when they conspire against great wrongs and argue to destroy this civilization. Any person shielded from restraints of conscience by a logic which poses on the dignity and grandeur of science, may guard himself and his legions from detection by buckling on the life-preserver of cold reason, and boxing himself into some sequestered laboratory and with recondite presumption, construct infernal machines. He may sally out with these and if there come conflicts between him and unjust jurisprudence or even tornadoes of destruction, it is but the recoil of a philosophy that is driving men's conscience from the earth.

This lack of conscience is seen in the brutal treatment of poor slaves by Damophilus to which we devote a long chapter of this book. It is a want of feeling that marks the social ages of the past and rightly does not belong to modern days.

It were difficult to describe the terrible depression of moral sentiments to which a man naturally sinks under this doctrine, if really convinced by it that his own cunning, aptitude and ambidexterity are legitimate forces upon which he must depend for success and survival. Freed from the fear of punishment beyond this life, he finds that the conscience within his breast has fled. There is no everliving, responsible soul and consequently no responsibility. He finds himself completely absolved from any danger except that of failing in the attempt. He depends entirely upon adroitness or cunning. Egotism lends him faith in this; for men are enterprising and glad to undertake innocent adventures and in this philosophy every act is innocent which does not recoil upon its author. Thus stimulated and shielded he goes back to brigandage and hardened to fratricide, is willing to do devil work of whatever manner that promises to gratify greed, whim or caprice, in cajoling the transient hour. In the competitive struggle for existence, it is true, every one has the same chances but the survival falls to him who possesses the most of force, tact and cunning. Reason has not yet changed the moral aspects of things from this fighting, competitive state, to the mutually co-operative condition wherein all harmoniously agree to care for each other as the best means of caring for themselves. This great epoch is fast coming. Until its arrival men are in the competitive, transitional state whose progress depends upon every possible advantage known in civilization; and one of the most powerful agents for transforming such into noble, sympathetic beings, and quickening them into the sweet emotions of love and care, is and always has been conscience. When the time arrives that reason shall have become wise, shall have massed its wayward individualism into collective solidarity, pruned off its egotism, dressed itself in robes of charity and mutual love, outgrown its benighted gropings and adapted itself to a seat in the Christian temple of equality, then there will be time for further and more scientifically investigating the crowning problem of immortality.

CHAPTER III.

LOST MSS. ARCHÆOLOGY

TRUE HISTORY OF LABOR FOUND ONLY IN INSCRIPTIONS AND MUTILATED ANNALS.

PROTOTYPES OF Industrial Life to be found in the Aryan and Semitic Branches—Era of Slavery—Dawn of Manumission—Patriarchal Form too advanced a Type of Government possible to primitive Man—Religious Superstition fatal to Independent Labor—Labor, Government and Religion indissolubly mixed—Concupiscence, Acquisitiveness and Irascibility a Consequence of the archaic Bully or Boss, with unlimited Powers—Right of the ancient Father to enslave, sell, torture or kill his Children—Abundant Proofs quoted—Origin of the greater and more humane Impulses—Sympathy beyond mere Self-preservation, the Result of Education—Education originated from Discussion—Discussion the Result of Grievances against the Outcast Work-people—Too rapid Increase of their Numbers notwithstanding the Sufferings—Means Organized by Owners for decimating them by Murder—Ample proof—The great Amphyctyonic League—Glimpses of a once sullen Combination of the Desperate Slaves—Incipient Organization of the Nobles.

THE history of the lowly classes of ancient society must begin with manumissions,¹ although slave labor seems the most ancient. There have come to us very few traces or accounts of the slaves of high antiquity. Except some relics which have been found in caves, some hieroglyphs carved not perhaps by themselves but by masters portraying their low condition,² we have no landmarks to guide our groping inquiry through the long night of time which lasted till the dawn of manumissions. Unlike the African slaves of modern times who were the property of a class of masters not of their own race or kindred, the ancient slaves were, in race and consanguinity, the equals of their masters; and there can be little doubt that the causes of their emancipation were in many instances, their own resistance to slavery. At present the laboring classes of the same races we are describing—the Semitic and Indo-European—are organizing in immense numbers and with skill to resist the forces which modern wage servitude inflicts; and it is therefore very similar to the great struggle humanity passed through in ancient times, to resist the oppressive system under which nearly all were born. The difference between the two struggles however, lies in the fact that the ancient one had to deal with the lowest, most debased and cruel species of subjugation which the ancient religion stamped into its tenets. Both these great struggles are of long duration. When the first was partly won Christianity came with its doctrine of equality³ and brought the struggle into the open world. It went hand in hand with the emancipation movement until chattel slavery and its vast, aged system may now be pronounced extinct throughout the civilized world. The struggle has continued; but from emancipating chattel slavery it has shifted to the enfranchisement of competitive labor.

¹ Granier de Cassagnac, Hist. des Classes Ouvrières, Chap. v.

² The typical strikes and uprisings of slaves do not come to us in their dreaded form except through vague, uncertain evidence, until about 600 years before Christ. See chapters on Strikes and Uprisings; infra.

Notwithstanding the profound learning and research devoted by M. de Laveleye⁴ in proof that the primitive condition of mankind was of patriarchal form, we find that the great slave system always prevailed among the Aryans from whom we are the immediate descendants; and indeed he sets out⁵ with a confession at least that the early Greeks and Romans never had any institutions of the communal or patriarchal nature. Prof. Denis Fustel de Coulanges makes no hesitation in saying that the Aryan religion, as already described, made the first born son, by the law of entail, the owner of his own children who thus became slaves.⁶ References to this old custom are very numerous in the ancient writings.⁷ Under Lycurgus⁸ the Spartans tried the system of communal proprietorship from the year 825 to 371 B. C. Although every deference was paid to the tenets of the Pagan religion that this celebrated code of laws established by the great lawgiver should not interfere with worship, yet worship itself being interwoven with property was seriously disturbed; because to divide among the people, the rabble, the profane, that which fell to the god who slept under the sacred hearth, or to his living son, seemed to be a sacrilege too blasphemous to endure. The scheme fell to naught. The probable fact is, that the ancient paterfamilias, perceiving himself robbed of his paternity, united with other patricians in similar trouble and succeeded in working the overthrow of the innovation. We propose to establish that these great innovations, like the laws of Lycurgus and many similar attempts at reform, the detailed causes of whose mighty commotions sometimes shook Rome and Greece like the eruption of a volcano, were often caused by the multitudes of secret trades and other social organizations existing in those ancient days

³ Granier, Hist. des Classes Ouvrières, pp. 392-4; Laveleye, Primitive Property. Introduc. to 1st ed., pp. xxvi., xxvii. xxx., xxxi. Here M. de Laveleye again admits slavery to have been earlier than communism.

⁴ Primitive Property, Eng. trans., pp. 7-25, chap. ii.

⁵ Idem, p. 6. "From the earliest times the Greeks and Romans recognized private property as applied to the soil and traces of ancient tribal community were already so indistinct as not to be discoverable without careful study." M. de Laveleye might better have said such traces are not discoverable at all; and indeed, the most of the instances he cites are of a comparatively recent era, the probable development of resistance, thousand of years after the manumission of slaves had set in as a result of their strikes and uprisings, of which we get clues.

Historians seldom mention them. The reason for this is quite clear. This disturbing element was made up of the outcasts of society. How did it come about that there were such outcasts? The answer to this involves a detour of discovery into phenomena of evolution. Of a family of say thirty persons—there exists abundance of evidence that there were often thirty and more persons born to one patrician or lord⁹—there is but a single owner or director, the first-born son. The other children and servants by purchase or otherwise, are slaves. It was a crime to leave the paternal estate. They might be clubbed to death for dis-

⁶ La Cité Antique; Leviticus, ii. 4.

⁷ Plato, Minos, also Servius In Æneid, v. 84, vi. 152.

⁸ Roscher, Histoire de l'Économie Politique, French tr. Paris, p. 192. "He adopted a common property; education in common, eating in common, stealing authorized, commerce interdicted, precious metals proscribed, land divided equally among the citizens etc."

⁹ Granier de Cassagnac, Hist. des Classes Ouvrières, p. 70

satisfaction with their lot but they must not leave or desert it. That entailed certain death. In extraordinary circumstances they actually did leave the bondage of the paternal estate and become wanderers or nomads. This was the probable origin of the second estate. We mean by this the freedman. Whether they obtained their freedom by revolt and bloodshed, by running away from their masters, or by emancipation as per agreement, makes little difference. In the Asiatic races of later times mentioned by Le Play,¹⁰ they seem to have never relinquished their allegiance to some lord, patriarch or ruler. By a tenacity of habit to which we shall refer, the very most ancient customs thus sometimes come down to us. The power of human habit is astonishing. There linger to this day, in the religion worshiped by the most enlightened of mankind, many rites and forms common in remote antiquity; for although the tenets and the sentiment are no longer the same, the old rites befit themselves to the new ideas.

Desertion from this bondage is known to have been a very risky affair; because the deserter or runaway slave had not only the perils of the act of desertion to run but he also forfeited his right and title to the small hope of bliss accorded him by the gods after death. Even at emancipation the right of worship ceased,¹¹ and a new altar had to be erected. This was in case of marriage of a daughter when no one was injured or offended. But a deserter was treated with terrible malignity both by the father or owner and by the injured deity whose relationship in pedigree or consanguinity he severed, desecrated, disgraced by the blasphemous act. They had curious opinions on death; and religion to those ancient working people, was a part of life.¹² The fear of not being buried with the right of sepulture was greater than the fear of death itself.¹³ Although comparatively no consequence was attached to a slave, yet the slave himself being by lineage and by entailment a chattel, evidently had some right to sepulture. Of what kind it is difficult to determine,¹⁴ because historians who recorded military deeds and legal transactions which in later days were considered work for noblemen, were themselves almost always of noble blood and would not mention so mean a thing as a slave who performed labor. This fact accounts largely for the scarcity of written record in regard to labor in ancient times.

¹⁰ Le Play, Organization of Labor, chap. i. §. 9, Eng. trans., assures us that among the nomads, the direct descendants of one father generally remained grouped together. They lived under the absolute authority of the head of the family, in a system of community. Some of them are living in this method still.

¹¹ Fustel de Coulanges, Cité Antique, chap. iii.

¹² Idem. chap. i. p. 12 "L'opinion première des antiques générations fut que l'être humain vivait dans le tombeau; que l'âme ne se séparait pas du corps et qu'elle restait fixée à cette partie du sol où les ossements étaient enterrés."

Compelled by the darkness of this unwritten age of slavery which must have lasted infinitely longer than seven thousand years of whose events we catch an occasional glimpse, we first find the great philosopher Aristotle acknowledging,¹⁵ in his startling prediction that "slave labor may become obsolete." So again Rodbertus of our own times, looking at and judging from the organized resistance of laboring men, predicts that society will outgrow wages or competitive slavery.¹⁶ Here are two seemingly parallel cases; the one representing a condition of affairs 350 years before Christ, the other taken from actual conditions before our own eyes, in both cases, given against the stubborn will of the ruling wealthy by two of the profoundest and most daringly honest philosophers the world has produced. At the time Rodbertus von Yägetzou made this startling prediction, Germany under Bismarck, was stifling every effort of press, legislation, trade-unions and socialists, to give the dreaded fact to the world. The freedmen at the time of Aristotle were forming an innumerable phalanx of combined strength. It is not hard for students of sociology to understand why in ancient times no mention was made by historians of the wonderful organizations which then existed. But for laws necessarily recorded for the use of government and for the habit which labor unions of those times entertained, compulsorily perhaps, of inscribing their name, festivities, the tutelary saint they worshiped and the handicraft they belonged to, upon slabs of stone, there would be no means of knowing or even conjecturing the history of a transition period which launched mankind, after long centuries of struggle, out of a passive submission to abject ser-

¹³ Idem, chap. i. Antiques Croyances.

¹⁴ Later we find cremation; but only the poor who possessed no ground burned their dead. These were the outcasts supposed to have no souls.

¹⁵ Aristotle, Politics, i. 4.

¹⁶ Rodbertus, Normal Arbeitstag; Ely, Hist. French and German Socialisms, pp. 176-7.

vitute into the true competitive system. We shall farther on have more to say in detail of the hatred and contempt which the ancient slave masters held toward their poor working chattels.

There was a taint upon labor. So there is now. Thus far then, there is no progress. We shall attempt to analyze the original cause of this taint upon labor and prove that the progress of to-day consists in its diminution.

Admitting the theory of development we go back to man at the dawn of reason, when he was still a beast. We even imagine a group, such as Professor Oswald Heer has pictured in the frontispiece of his masterly scientific work on the fossils of Switzerland.¹⁷ Prowling around this group of naked human forms—some upon trees, others crawling, others walking plantigrade, or gorilla-like—we see wild animals, birds and reptiles, all in search of food. Just as the steer after a desperate encounter with its rival comes out the victor and ever holds the mastery over the rest of a herd, so the most powerful and ferocious of this group of primeval men wins with his club, his fingers or fists the mastery over the rest. These are first impulses. They are entirely animal in character. Wild geese and ducks seek in conflict the means of knowing which of their flock shall be leader in their flight; and him of the most magnetic or muscular or intellectual powers they follow. The purely animal, then, is the form which primitive, animal man assumes. This strong master of the group is the prototype of the patrician and inheritor of the estate as thousands of years afterwards we find him lord of the manor with his slaves about him. It would be absurd to suppose that immediately at the dawn of reason, this wild animal actually assumed one of the highest types of civilization. The communistic or even the patriarchal is one of the highest forms which human beings have attempted. They have, it is true, been attempted but mostly to prove failures; simply because they were of a type even in their crudest state, too far progressed for others to appreciate and apply. The master or as we may better characterize him, the bully has always been too jealous. That Abraham and Moses tried a very low form of it, and isolated themselves so as not to interfere with others, is true. But it is too well known that the Hebrews were not appreciated in their good work. Their very attempt to institute the patriarchal system even in its imperfect, half competitive form, brought against them the jealousy of the world of heathendom. It was an intolerable innovation upon the more ancient, aristocratic, brutal system of masters and slaves. And it was no mere individual, but this gigantic system which massed its powers to drive the presumptuous Hebrews from the face of the earth.

¹⁷ Dr. Oswald Heer, Urwelt der Schweiz,

The mere animal form of government must have come first. This reasoning, says the law of evolution, must have borne very brutal forms. Surely enough, so we find it at the dawn of history and at the highest discernible antiquity not only in Greece and Rome but in Egypt. It was the slave system under which the Egyptian monuments were built; and no thinking person can doubt that thousands of years of this slavery must have elapsed before the Egyptians arrived at the art of architecture in which recorded history finds them. Advancing reason had already been of millennial date ere those people could have known how to carve their hieroglyphs with nice precision upon the monuments. Again, we fail to see that these inscriptions mention any mode of a more ancient communal or patriarchal government. The simplest form of governing the primeval race must have been the one adopted; and the simplest was the one common among the animals of to-day. There was at the head of every group, or tribe, or family, a master; and him the rest obeyed, afterwards adored.

It next seems natural that surrounded by wild and fierce creatures of the waters, glades and forests, the first reasonable thing to protect this master would be to select some place of security—some rock or cave or height, whence he might go or send forth into the forests, the swamps and shores in search of fruit, roots, shellfish and game. Another thing; it is natural for man to settle permanently somewhere. This is peculiarly the case with the Aryan races. It is the form of life almost universally adopted by the Indo-Europeans. They select a seat and conquer and subjugate in all directions. This also corresponds with our proposition that the first idea was to obtain a home. With the growth of experience in the application of reason came egoism which it is said the brute does not often manifest. Now with animal prowess, a little reason and a large egoism, we have what the present labor movement calls a "boss." He is endowed with the three great attributes which our modern authorities on moral philosophy denominate irascibility and concupiscence.

Given the right of proprietorship wrung through superiority in physical power from his tribe and his children, and he unhesitatingly uses them as slaves. This the true beast cannot do, since it requires reason. The first impulse, that of cupidity, makes him a tyrant and the second, that of irascibility, fills him with cruel ferocity, accounting for the well known fact that the ancient slave-holder could and often did kill his own children.¹⁸ The first impulse, that of concupiscence and acquisitiveness combined into one, makes him desirous to enjoy and accumulate. So his children are numerous. These two nearly allied sources of human desire or greed filled him with a rivalry to accumulate and often to sequester the stores which the toil of his slaves produced.

A third impulse, that of sympathy, being yet mostly wanting, man reasonably was thus filled with pomp and greed. These whetted his yet unbridled passions, making him ambitious to embellish his estate, caused the land to be fruitful, inspired him to build better houses, select and multiply his concubines and otherwise adorn the paternity. But the original parent-aristocrat or paterfamilias never until much later, desisted from the enforcement of absolute virtue of the parent-aristocrat mother or materfamilias.

Sympathy, it would seem came to him but tardily. Sympathy was inspired later;—brought into the world through the cult of the organizations of freedmen, after the beginning of the era of manumissions. Socrates and Aristotle recognized their powerful school of fraternal coherence and mutual love which it seems almost certain culminated in the wonderful institution known as Christianity, destroying the old Paganism or, at least, laying the foundation for its final eradication from the world.

This picture presents a poor outlook for the slaves, who were obliged to perform the master's drudgery. They however, always had two advantages: being to the family born, ¹⁸ Terentius, Heauton Timorumenos, Act III. 5; Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Antiquitates Romanæ, lib. II. cap. xxvi.; Codex Justiniani, lib. VII. tit. xlvii. Pandectæ, (Digest), lib. XXVIII. leg. xi.

they owned a meagre right to some kind of burial; whereas it is known that later, the freedman could only expect cremation. To have the remains refused the noble rite of burial was a disgrace. It was a virtual acknowledgement that the person had no soul. Malefactors, runaways or deserters and freedmen so lowly as to be without protection, in other words all whom God spurned to recognize as having an immortal life, were burned or cast out to rot without honors.¹⁹ The other advantage was that their owners were their supporters which freed slaves from the responsibilities of the struggle for bread. Still the whole picture presents a poor outlook for the slaves who were obliged to perform his drudgery. But as if they might be inclined to desert him the religious belief was so riveted upon their benighted minds that for thousands of years they did not doubt that the punishment for desertion would be a species of damnation. The slaves were taught that the most hallowed of all places was the central focus or altar of worship of the manes of their master. The holy and awful funeral repast had always to be partaken upon the same spot where the family ancestors lay. Thus for generations families worshiped each other at the same tomb.²⁰ We have already quoted from Dr. Fustel that the dread of being deprived of sepulture was greater than the fear of death itself. So fearful were the ancients, even the ancient laborers, of arousing the ire of their tutelary deities that they worshiped them by sacrifices. They even fed²¹ these disengaged souls²² and periodically furnished them with wine, milk, fruit, honey and other table delicacies which in life they had been known to prefer. These strange beliefs which were by no means confined to the Indo-European, but as Fustel de Coulanges has made clear, embraced the entire Aryan family,²³ were the

¹⁹ Cicero, De Legibus, 2, 23, "Hominem mortuum, inquit lex XII., (meaning the Twelve Tables,) in Urbe ne sepelito neve urito..... Quid? qui post XII. in Urbe sepulti, sunt clari viri."

²⁰ Euripides, Trojans, 381.

²¹ Virgil, Æneid, III. 800; Euripides, Iphigenia, 476, "Behold, I pour upon the earth of the tomb milk, honey and wine; for it is with these that we revivify the dead;" Cf. also, Ovid, Fastus, II. 540.

²² Critically, this expression is incorrect; for the ancients believed that the soul was never disengaged, but remained buried with the body in bliss. Consult Fustel de Coulanges, Cité Antique, liv. I. chap. iv.

²³ In substance Dr. Fustel, Idem. p. 26 says: Ces croyances ne sont pas assurément empruntées ni par les Grecs des Hindous ni par les Hindous des Grecs; mais elles appartenaient à toutes les deux races, de loin reculées et du milieu de l'Asie.

prevailing ones and formed the basis of the great Pagan religion. The superstition worked so powerfully upon the benighted conscience of slaves that however severe their lot, they required a higher scale of enlightenment than could be had in these low forms of slavery before they could see their way clear to revolt. This, however came in the course of time. There is no doubt that discussion among the numerous organizations of freedmen did much toward bringing this about. The increasing number of slaves also gave them opportunity to meet and interchange opinions. In the deep gloom of abject slavery men seldom revolt. Revolt is especially rare where there is no contact with public opinion adverse to it. It is not probable therefore, that the slaves, however bad their treatment, found themselves in a condition enough advanced in the scale of manhood to organize revolt until thousands of years of their abject servitude had elapsed. But it appears certain that revolts had been going on for a long time before we catch the earliest clues to their history.

When language had become perfected and means of mutual comprehension had come into their grasp, so that an intelligent interchange of each others feelings was had, and it became easy to express their grievances and sufferings one with another, they began to revolt. If a lord or capitalist in a paroxysm of unbridled rage, ordered one slave for a trivial offense to be strangled by the others,²⁴ they were compelled to be the executioners of their comrade. If his majesty raised his hand and dashed out the brains of his own child, the other children,²⁵ though by no means so keenly sensitive to the horror as we of our own time, would feel a common sympathy and perhaps lay up the infanticide for a future day of vengeance. When the right of sepulture was taken from them and they found that even the consolation of religion was gone, they went desperate and reckless over the imagined withdrawal, by the God they worshiped, of his blessing. In this state of mind they must have frequently plotted together and concocted insurrections.²⁶ They however, did not co-operate with each other for the accumulation of wealth. This is a phenomenon of which we shall hereafter speak more lengthily. But the principle cause of the rebellious which in course of time became very common, was their increase among themselves. It must not be supposed because the master who owned all at their expense and degradation, that he could and did live in unbridled libertinism among his human chattels, who by reason of the taint on labor never had recognized family alliances among each other. However stringent the rules of tyrants over the oppressed they were never known to entirely prevail over nature. What the form of alliance between the sexes of the very ancient slaves may have been is not fully known;—whether free of formality or by the ligature of accorded right.²⁷ Be that as it may, the fact remains that the human race was by no means dependent for its increase upon the heads of optimate families. As was the case with the negro slaves in the Southern States of the American Republic, so in Greece and Italy the slaves multiplied among themselves. In course of time they grew very numerous. Of course, as their number increased they outgrew the actual requirements of the landed estate to which they were enfeoffed. Then they were sold to other estates or killed.²⁸ Later when wars occurred they become mercenaries,²⁹ in earlier times, under their owners, as impedimenta of the army; not as combatants, because they were of too ignoble birth to engage in the aristocratic vocation of war. Still later we find them assuming the dignity of combatants. Of this latter period we find clearer traces, and shall show that these mercenaries were none other than the supernumeraries from the estates, who had run away to take into their own hands the struggle for ex-

²⁴ See story of Damophillos in chapter viii., on the revolt of Eunus.

²⁵ We have, in the ancient records, many allusions to the murder of children by the lords of the estate. See Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Archologia Rhomana, lib. II. cap. xxvi. 'Ο δὲ τῶν Ῥωμαίων νομοθέτης ἄποσαν, ὡς εἶπεν, ἔδωκεν ἐξουσίαν πατρὶ καθ' υἱοῦ, καὶ παρὰ παντὰ τὸν τοῦ βίου χρόνον . . . , εἴαντε ἀποκτείνουσι προαιρῆται. Also Code of Justinian, lib. VIII. tit. xlvii. leg. X., where this right is mentioned as having once existed: "Jus (patribus) vitæ in liberos necisque potestas olim erat permissa."

²⁶ Undeniable evidence of this is found in the great servile wars of Sicily, where Demeter or Ceres, goddess of that region was complained of by the slaves as having deserted them. See Bücher, Aufstände der unfreien Arbeiter, S. 53 and 54, Siefert, Sicilische Sklavenkriege, S. 17-18.

²⁷ See chapters xiii. to xx. on the Collegia and Sodalicia of Italy and the Eranoi and Thiasoi of the Greek-speaking labor unions, which produce plenty of proof that from before B. C. 600, the freedmen had their laws of marriage. The more ancient slavery is obscure in records of the social habits of the poor.

²⁸ Granier de Cassagnac, Hist. des Classes Ouvrières, p. 61.

²⁹ Grote, History of Greece,—Dionysius the Elder. Dionysius, Tyrant of Syracuse employed mercenaries. and Dion's conquest of Syracuse against Dionysius the Younger was begun with mercenary troops in B. C. 359.

istence. It is very easy to prove that there were organizations or unions of mercenaries who sold their services to princes and their generals, undertaking to accomplish certain military feats for a recompense.

But we are still treating of the workingman as a slave. The father of the family was one individual. But the family itself often consisted of fifty. Now as the only one of all these eligible to the blooded dignity of nobility was the father, what became of the rest?²⁰ They were not only slaves but they formed, as it were, another race. They were the plebeians, the proletariat; "hewers of wood and drawers of water." It was impossible under the extremes of this social divergence, for any communication or sympathy to be recognized between them. Even though the master was the father and the child legitimate though a slave, by the deadly inheritance of his bondage riveted upon him through immemorial usage, he dared not look up into his parent's face with the sweet, tender love of our modern consanguinity! It was a sacrilege. Equality was impossible. The number therefore, of the slave race compared with the noble, was as fifty to one. Even as late as the beginning of that powerful reform known as Christianity which may be characterized as an emancipation proclamation, the slave system was in full operation and the number of slaves enormous.

It is through that long night of slavery for the working people, that humanity received its almost indelible stamp of reproach and contempt which lingers to-day in the "taint" of labor. During the struggle of strikes and uprisings that set in after the slaves became numerous and colonies of them, either as marauders or adventurers appeared, the slave race developed many men and women of extraordinary genius and ability. We shall present an elaborate history of these as landmarks in our biography of the lowly while groping through the barren void which the historians and the literary wreckers have left us, torn in fragments or quite unchronicled in their short sighted contempt and eagerness to set forth only exploits which the ambition of their noble masters inspired. So poor was the food doled out by the masters to their slaves that they may be said to have been fed like animals from the crib. Horace, Herodotus, Lucanus, Livy, Pliny and many others give testimony of the wretched food these poor slaves received in Greece, Egypt and Rome. Peas,³¹ nuts, roots, pods, skimmed milk, very poor bread, and none made of white wheat flour.³² Great suffering from want is mentioned in Pliny's Natural History, among the slaves of Italy. An epidemic like the black death twice broke out among them. He also states that this disease did not attack the noble or well-to-do people.³³ These great sufferings and privations caused the death rate to be so high as to decimate the ranks of the slaves thus reducing the danger always feared by the masters, of revolt and of plottings for insurrection. Aside from the curse which their lowly condition stamped upon the slaves, they were treated with ignominy and generally marked with the *stiches*³⁴ on their faces. The word stigma among the Greeks was full of reproach, not only because the scars were on the faces and bodies of these poor white men and women³⁵ doomed to perpetual servitude, but because it was also indelibly stamped upon their social life. Granier who produced a gem in his great work³⁶ for which the subsequent labor movement acknowledges its indebtedness, says of this ancient slavery; "This curse of blood is implacable. Ventidius Bassus was so fortunate as to become a consul. They said to him, you were a boot-black. Galerius, Diocletian, Probus, Pertinax, Vitellius, even Augustus had the good fortune to become emperors. They said to Galerius: You were a swineherd; to Diocletian: You were a slave; to Probus: Your father was a gardener; to Pertinax: Your father was a freedman; to Vitellius: Your father was a cobbler; and they went so

²⁰ The Materfamilias or married mother kept herself in severe seclusion so as to be above suspicion.

³¹ Horace, Ad Pisonem, v. 249.

³² Homer, Odyssey, lib. VIII. c. v. 221, 222. The earth-born multitudes:

"Τῶν δ' ἄλλων ἐμὲ φημι πολὺ προφερέστερον εἶναι, Ὅσσοι νῦν βροτοὶ εἰσιν ἐπὶ χθονὶ σῖτον ἔδοντες."

³³ Pliny, Natural History, XXVI. c. iii. "Non fuerat hæc lues apud majores patresque nostros."

³⁴ See Comædies of Plautus: Stichus, "The marked Slave;" also Plutarch, Nicias, 29; Xenophon, De Vectigal., c. iv; Diod XXXIV. Fragment, Dindorf.

³⁵ Homer, Iliad, I. 238 "The earth-born multitude."

³⁶ Granier de Cassagnac, Hist. des Classes Ouvrières; especially in chap. v. 117; McCullagh, Industrial History of Free Nations;—The Greeks. This scholar quotes from Hesiod's Ἔργα καὶ Ἡμέραι, v. 186., where the great poet appeals to the lords for amelioration of the people's sufferings: "Hesiod lived for many years in Bœtia where the oppression and exclusiveness of the dominant classes was as unrelenting as in Lacedæmon." Greek Industries, pp 6-7.

far as to write on the marble of the statue of Augustus, in the life time of this master of the world: Your grandfather was a merchant, and your father a usurer." The same keen observer in his investigation of these ancient phenomena of slavery, makes a very important suggestion, the result, he says, of his own personal reading of the Iliad of Homer: that as there is in the whole of that celebrated poem, not one allusion to freedmen, or to the subject of emancipation; whereas in the Odyssey there appear many allusions thereto it is therefore, following the line of reason adopted by comparative philologists and historiographers in search of facts in ethnography, very reasonable to suppose that the Iliad is the oldest, and that the Odyssey came afterwards." Here is a suggestion worth much to anthropologists in general; and it is to be hoped it may be cleared so as to become useful to the study of Sociology. We hear of no great spasm like that of the war of the rebellion of our own day, which produced the emancipation of the slaves. If nothing of that kind occurred between the composition of those two poems, so ancient and obscure, then it is reasonable to imagine that the emancipation was gradual; and if gradual, an unlimited time must have elapsed—perhaps thousands of years—between their composition. This alone seems capable of solving the incongruity. But it tends forcibly to show the astonishing age of slavery which may well be called the long night of suffering of our progenitors. Certain it is, however that the Iliad treats of the extremes; the lords upon the one hand and on the other the slaves. The want of an intermediary class shows its high antiquity.

At any rate, all these researches accumulate evidence showing the absurdity of a communistic or nomadic form of society having been possible among the Indo-Europeans from whom we are descended unless that tendency supervened upon the ancient system of land tenure in subsequent times. There crops out one curious association in very ancient history which, to the reader wishing to gratify his military or ecclesiastical taste is totally unaccountable; but which appears quite plain to those who study history to enjoy glimpses of the social life of the past. We refer to the aristocratic Amphictyonic Council.

³⁷ Granier de Cassagnac, Hist. des Classes Ouvrières, chap. v. p. 109.

The student of the great slave system sees the absurdity of attributing this ancient series of protective organizations either to ambitious military schemes or to pure piety, although they are given to us by historians, as a system of neighbors organized to protect and perpetuate the worship of the Gods. They come down to us from the gloomy tradition of high antiquity ; and to the two first mentioned classes they are utterly incomprehensible. The sociologist however, who sees the slaves growing in numbers while the *gens*³⁸ remained stationary in numbers, can easily picture the causes and spirit of these leagues. They were confederations of the lords or individual owners of the patrimonies or estates. These estates, as we have seen, fell to the lords, by entail in primogeniture. The Amphictyony³⁹ was simply a co-operative association of the lords to defend their estates; and they most naturally, as customary with all Pagan ancients, held forth first and foremost the horrors of irreligion, knowing that the superstition of the slaves was their true stronghold, since by making it appear that attack upon or contemptuousness of the holy property was an unpardonable misdemeanor or even to utter words of conspiracy against that property remaining in the hands of the first born son, was blasphemy. This superstition thus inculcated was always, in ancient times, the bulwark of protection to the nobles. The Amphictyony existed 2,000 years before Christ, probably even much prior to that time, and grew more and more powerful, until about B. C. 700 it had grown in numeric strength and in the subtle art of self-protection so that it assumed the dignity of the Amphictyonic Council, seated itself in the holy temples of Apollo and Demeter, and had delegates who met there spring and autumn, representing twelve tribes or states of Greece and the Archipelago. Some 600 years before Christ the Amphictyonic Council had misunderstandings with its delegates and wars of extermination began. These troubles were called the holy wars. It is known that for many centuries these corporations protected themselves mutually. If one of the small neighborhoods represented in and protected by the federation was attacked or threatened, the entire power of all the others was thrown together in its defense. The article of agreement between them ran as follows: Not to destroy or allow to be destroyed or cut off from water, in peace or war, any town in the Amphictyonic brotherhood; not to plunder⁴⁰ the property of the god or treacherously extract valuables from the sanctum. Now in face of the fact that there were by this time great numbers of supernumerary slaves who had, on account of their servitude and the abuses they suffered, become reckless, fierce and ready to enter upon a life of desperate revolt, still we find writers denying that this brotherhood had any other idea than a purely religious one. To the searching sociologist it is quite clear that this organization must have been one of the very first efforts of the Indo-Europeans to form a government for the protection of property,

³⁸ Latin "Gens," whence the "gentry." See Mann's Ancient and Mediæval Republics, chapter vi.

³⁹ Fiske. American Political Ideas. p. 72.

From incipency this must have been the earliest form of government. But it was an aristocratic government which cast a taint on labor. It perpetuated the holiness of property which has ever since upheld the dogma of divine right of the fathers and of kings and is probably the originator of that dogma. Away back in the past, before the country had become thickly peopled and while superstition combined with rigid rules of the masters, kept down all danger of revolt among the slaves, there were no cities.⁴¹ We have not space in this work to explain the phenomenon of the ancient city, but refer the curious to Dr. Fustel, whose work⁴² cannot be perused without profit. Modern scholars are making valuable compilations of evidence showing that cities, like nearly everything else, were a natural and gradual growth.

The great Hesiod, himself a poor freedman if not a slave, may have had the Amphictyonic league and its wars in mind when he wrote :

"Men's right arm is law ; for spoils they wait
And lay their mutual cities desolate." ⁴³

⁴⁰ The custom was to bury with the deceased father many precious articles of which he was fond in life. See Funck-Brentano, La Civilisation et ses Lois, on this Fetish custom and his evidence that the favorite wife was often buried alive along with the other trinkets; livre II. c. II. pp. 114-116.

⁴¹ Fustel de Coulanges, Cité Antique, liv. III. c. II. et III.

⁴² Id. III. c. I.

⁴³ Hesiod, Ἔργα καὶ Ἡμέραι, V. 161.

CHAPTER IV.

ELEUSINIAN MYSTERIES

ANCIENT GRIEVANCES OF THE WORKERS.

WORKING PEOPLE destitute of Souls—Original popular Beliefs—Plato finally gives them half a Soul—Modern Ignorance on the true Causes of certain Developments in History—Sympathy, the Third Great Emotion developed out of growing Reason, through mutual Commiseration of the Outcasts—A new Cult—The Unsolved Problem of the great Eleusinian Mysteries—Their wonderful Story—Grievances of slighted Workingmen—Organization impossible to Slaves except in their Strikes and Rebellions—The Aristocrats' Politics and Religion barred the Doors against Work-people—Extraordinary Whims and Antics at the Eleusinian Mysteries—The Causes of Grievances endured by the Castaway Laborers—Their Motives for Secret Organization—The Terrible Cryptia—The horrible Murders of Workingmen for Sport—Dark Deeds Unveiled—Story of the Massacre of 2,000 Workingmen—Evidence—The Grievances in Sparta—In Athens—Free Outcast Builders, Sculptors, Teachers, Priests, Dancers, Musicians, Artisans, Diggers, all more or less Organized—Return to the Eleusinian Mysteries—Conclusion....

DURING the long period occupying—in the case of the Indo-European race from which most of us are derived, several thousand years, there came about a differentiation in favor of the slaves. Granier in his bright exposition of this great social subject, declares slavery to have been the natural outcome of the Pagan, or family religion.¹ Fustel de Coulanges in his instructive and extraordinarily lucid work has proved every word written by Granier upon this daring theme, to be true.² Philosophers of our age, catching at written and unwritten obscurities which saliently obtrude upon the path of researchers groping in sociology, are getting down to real causes of events which for 2,000 years remained phenomena undeciphered. Ages upon ages have rolled and the mouldering stones and tablets, invaluable with their begrimed inscriptions, have saucily stared at science, unheeded. Furtive hints by ancient historians for centuries have mocked the lore of universities, bearing their inuendos which failed to insult the professorial sticklers to our darling notes and emendations. Great Social wars with ominous wing have been flopping and airing our ignorance as to their deep, suppressed causes. Then the downfall of the Roman empire—that of all others most inexplicable wonder—has been for twenty centuries chopped up into indigestible morsels and administered to students of history searching after great events and ecclesiastical lore. At last the student of sociology enters the field. He is philosopher enough to divest himself of the crusty film in which prejudice is encysted and manly enough to step out of the contumelious state and like a Murillo go down among the tatterdemalions and give them credit for what they were.

¹ Hist. des Classes Ouvrières, pp. 39-41. Vide chap. iii. passim.

Society began with the bully.³ It began with unbridled irascibility, concupiscence and egoism. This creature, man, having killed or clubbed away the others, sought among the females the handsomest mate and in the best cave or hut began the family. The Aryan is not a nomad. He wants a home, a permanent residence. He is brigand enough to launch forth into all the enterprizes of plunder, but he returns to his home. This home remained his fastness which he would not quit. The land around it became his. When children came they were also his. When they grew strong and could work, his concupiscence differentiated into cupidity; and begetting many, he forced them to work. They became his slaves. If the little ones refused or otherwise displeased him his irascible impulses prevailed and he killed them. Those whom he could not spare he only punished. His irascibility made him a tyrant, while his acquisitiveness made him rich. He became a lord. Sympathy was a stranger to his bosom though no doubt it worked an influence at an early day in moulding the nature of the family, as we know there were favorites.

² La Cité Antique, pp. 76-89; See also Iliad, xxi., Odyssey, xxii., Leviticus, xxv. 40, 41, 44, 47, 48.

³ We are forced to employ this homely term as there exists in English no other which so nearly conveys our idea.

He lived in the wonder-world. The phenomena of nature he could not understand. There were thunders and lightnings, but electricity was a terror which shaped a god. When this god of nature grew into shape upon his imagination his egoism coveted its glory and immortality and the bully came to imagine himself a god; and assumed for himself power and immortality deifying himself at death and ordaining his first-born son his worshiper and the sole inheritor of his fortune. The remuneration demanded of the son for this succession was the paternal worship and the deification and adoration of the dead father, now a saint. Egoism was thus the originator of the Pagan religion, of immortality and of the sainthood.⁴

It was a part of the genius of this cult to be aristocratic and exclusive. It inculcated divine rights of masters, of noble lords and afterwards of kings. On the other hand it was a part of the genius of paganism to have slaves. It was so exclusively aristocratic that only a very few could possibly enjoy its beatitudes. The rest were obliged to be castaways. The castaways who were debarred the favoritism of eternal life through the aristocratic burial and deification were slaves, doomed by an inheritance of expropriation and of poverty, to slavery. When they became numerous, although wretched, there now and then developed a man or woman of genius. Bereft of everything tangible, they still had minds. With minds they considered and discussed their lowly condition; with strength and ingenuity some worked themselves out of bondage and became freedmen. As freedmen they began to organize into protective associations and trade unions. Thus two distinct parties were formed.

Meantime the power of the lords or property owners increased but not so rapidly in numeric strength as the power of the outcast, and the grandees, seeing the bondmen, runaways and freedmen forming into communes, some as tradesmen, some as brigands, all dissatisfied, some very dangerous, also betook themselves to organization. Thus there were two distinct classes. Which of these two classes began earliest to organize for self defense we cannot undertake to prove but reason conjectures that it must have been the outcasts. But certain it is ⁵ they formed into powerful phratries ⁶ or curies for mutual assistance, sometimes under religious pretenses, as in the case of the Italian collegia.

⁴ Latin paganus, of, or belonging to the country, pagus. There were then no towns or cities. These came later. Cf. La Cité Antique, passim.

All along, parallel with each other through time, these two systems, the grandees or gentes on the one hand and the outcasts or disinherited on the other, have existed, securing themselves by mutual organization. We do not see in history much of the working classes. The principal mention made of them is in connection with slavery and the concomitant degradation of servitude. We know from certain passages in history that insurrections or slave rebellions occurred. Some of them were on a prodigious scale. Plutarch mentions instances where the masters by decree of the phratries sometimes allured large numbers of the slaves on plea of a festival or hunt and when at a convenient spot fell upon and murdered them by hundreds, merely to get rid of a dangerous element.⁷ That the servile element keenly felt the contempt in which they were regarded, crops out in the records of the remote past. We propose to give many instances.

The exclusion of slaves, freedmen and afterwards Christians from the Eleusinian mysteries gives the student of sociology an important hint to pages of the unwritten labor question; showing the reasons why the outcasts resorted to co-operation among themselves, as an only practical court of appeals to any power against oppression when aggrieved. All writers who have spoken of this celebrated and mysterious organization agree that it was very ancient. As we have found irrefutable evidences of numerous trade unions so early as the eighth and ninth century before Christ, we

⁵ Fustel de Coulanges, Cité Antique, lib. II. pp. 39-89, La Famille; Mann's Ancient and Medieval Republics, pp. 22-27.

⁶ Morgan, Ancient Societies, p. 88: "The φπαρία is a brotherhood, as the term imports; and a natural growth from the organization into gentes. It is an organic union or association of two or more gentes of the same tribe for certain common objects. These gentes were usually such as had been formed by the segmentation of an original gens." This author sees some analogy between the ancient Greek and Roman gens and certain tribes of North American Indians; notably the Iroquois. Consult chapters II. and III.

⁷ Plutarch, Lycurgus; also Lycurgus and Numa compared.

Need not trace the Eleusinian band back of that time. It is however, worthy of remark that this organization existed at a much earlier date and that, although the societies of the workmen do not as luminously come to the front on account of this stigma which made them secret and prevented their recognition, it is no proof whatever that they did not also exist. The organization known as the Eleusinians,⁸ according to ancient authors was in full force 1,500 years before Christ. Cicero who was an admirer of all the pagan forms that tended to hand down the exclusive splendor and dignity of the aristocratic stock, believed these feasts to have belonged to the remotest antiquity and that they lasted the longest of almost any institution.⁹ Like the great trade-union movement they transmit unwritten records through an occasional slab, bearing inscriptions.¹⁰

The Eleusinian crusade was a celebrated and exclusively aristocratic religious festival in honor of the goddess Demeter or Ceres,¹¹ held at Eleusis, a large town some ten miles from Athens, in Attic Greece. It was a great outpouring from Athens, every 5 years in the month Boedromion,¹² lasting nine days. The great preparations made before the festival began, the extraordinary solemnity of the affair, the manner in which the Athenians attended it in a drome or chanting caravansary, gave it the appearance of a crusade. It was the origin of all well-known crusades. The attendance at this crusade was a trial of one's eligibility to the blessings of life eternal. Eleusis means a trysting place; consequently it is probable that the great games suggested the name of the place, and once established upon a projecting rock of the sea, the city afterward grew around it and in course of time held a large population. There are some touching mementoes which may be gleaned from this celebrated name. Whoever reads the bible in Greek finds frequent mention of this word in the signification of the coming of the Saviour. It is a symbolic word. Emblems in

⁸ In later centuries the little Mysteries continued though they were not confined to Eleusis.

⁹ Cicero, De Legibus, II. cap. XVI.; Panegyricus of Isocrates, 6.

¹⁰ Judging from the slab of Paros they began in the fifteenth century before Christ, Laronsse, Dictionnaire Universel, Art. Les Eleusiniens.

¹¹ Ceres, like the Pelasgic Hermes was the ithiphalic deity, having power over reproduction and the supplies of life. Cf. Encyc. Brit. vol. XI. p. 670.

¹² Βοηδρομιών, the space of time from September 15th. to October 15th.; from βοηρομαι, I chase with a shout. Theseus in the battle with the Amazons, chased them with cries. It is a word of great antiquity. Plutarch, Theseus, those days were common; and much that is unexplained or that may yet be explained—unexplained through ignorance or neglect—comes out, by a proper interpretation of emblems.

But the Eleusinian mysteries were too absurdly exclusive to stand the erosions of what is known as progress. In perfect agreement with what we have said regarding the exclusive character of their worship, centering it upon the egoistic household name, forcing a puffed aristocracy by dint of glorifying a human creature and cutting off that glory from the many, especially those who toil, it had made itself odious and intolerable long before the advent of Christ. Yet the antiquity and greatness of the trysting scenes at Eleusis had become renowned in every well-known part of the world. All over Palestine, long afterwards the cradle of another but infinitely more democratic plan of worship, this curious practice was well-known. In Italy and Africa its fame had gone forth.

We are not speaking of the Eleusinian mysteries merely to recount a paltry historico-ecclesiastical fact. We are making a point in sociologic research. We therefore ask our reader's indulgence in comparing the social life of homespun work-people through a metaphor as opposite as the Eleusinian emblems. Yet it is no metaphor. It bears with it a bone of contention which raged for centuries, split and divided, founded heresies, sophistries, philosophies, provoked labor unions, involved work-people in communism, drew out discussion and laid the foundation of the religion of Jesus in after years. We now proceed to explain how this was done. In ancient mythology Proserpine, or as some write it, Persephone, was the beautiful daughter of Ceres the Demeter, and of Jupiter. Pluto the god of the infernal regions fell in love with Proserpine and while she was in the act of gathering flowers in a vale of Enna in Sicily, stole her from her mother, carrying her off to his nether-world home.¹³ The mother though an immortal and living on the heights of Enna the Sicilian Olympus, was so grieved at the loss of her child that she came down from heaven, betook to herself the garb of mortals, became an old woman, assumed the duties of a nurse and wandered through the country,

¹³ Infra, chap. viii., containing the story of Euneus and the great servile war

plying her profession for a subsistence from place to place. She went to Eleusis and there got employment. It was a job of nursing a child of the king of the place. The child's name was Demophon and under the celestial solicitude of this goddess in disguise, Metaira, the mother, beheld with astonishment and curiosity the marvelous thrift of her boy. Ceres breathed upon him the breath of life, dressed him with ambrosial ointment and at night used to purge the dross of mortality from him by immersing him in a bath of mysterious fire, with an object of making him also immortal. But one night the fond and curious mother peeped through the veil screening the immortalizing process of trans-substantiation and seeing the boy pendent in a halo of flame screamed with affright, causing the haggard old nurse to let the youngster drop deep into the consuming pit where he instantly perished. The hag then, to save herself, threw off her disguise became rehabilitated and forced the people of Eleusis to build her a temple to dwell in while still continuing her search for the lost Proserpine. Now the professional business of Jupiter was to watch the interests of mortal men. But Ceres unable to endure the loss of her stolen child and remembering the details of her husband's escape when a babe from the ferocious Saturn, struck the earth with her wand of famine. She rebelled energetically against the shape of things, and at last Jupiter came to the rescue of the innocent denizens of the earth as a professional duty. This led to the discovery of Proserpine. From her temple at Eleusis, Demeter who was the protectress of the products of labor made things uncomfortable for the people who were in her husband's care. They were stricken with malaria. Contagion spread. The ground ceased to produce and the horrors of famine engulfed them. Men prayed, sacrificed, and besought their patron gods, each gens for itself, and urged the further combination of gentile tribes into phratries to no effect until great Jove at last got Mercury to visit Erebus who went down into the pagan inferno where Pluto was enjoying the charms of the beautiful stolen prize. Thus the sly god got found out. This pagan inferno was Hades where Pluto was king. He, like Satan was cunning. He knew that by tempting her, as the devil a time before had tempted Eve, he could induce her to eat the forbidden fruit;—this time a pomegranite seed. Unwarily she was lured into the temptation which cost her a fourth part of each year, for the rest of her immortal existence, in the infernal abode with Pluto. The other three-fourths of the year, however, she was permitted to pass upon earth.

Such is the ridiculous story which among the ancients, was believed at the point of the poniard or under penalty of the hemlock for at least two thousand years. To cavil with its austere sanctity was a heresy costing the blasphemist his life and every hope of immortality.

Some palliation of the absurdity of this sub-terrestrial abode is furnished by the qualification that in ancient belief the world was flat, not round; and between the two flat surfaces there flowed a river with whose murky waters Erebus had something to do. On the other side, once there, the journeying immortals were ushered into view of the indescribable beatitudes of the elysium. This gorgeous terra incognita was not to be reached without passing the terrible cynocephalous or many-headed watchdog named Cerberus. But heaven was on the other side. Passage from this to that was the agony.

Now Ceres, the wife of the mighty Jupiter and mother of the lovely Proserpine, was the goddess of the harvests. She represented the cereals. She rode on a jagatnatha drawn by dragons. Her brow was coronated with wreaths of wheat. This rape of Proserpine by Pluto on the ragged edge, between our world of mortals and heaven became emblematic of the agonies of winter;—from autumn when the wheat was sown, then the cold hyemal gloom of gestation in the dark borderlands, the trysting place, the hyperborean domain of hades; thence over the half congelated Styx was ferried the elastic imagination by the money getting Charon, and behold, the vernal raptures of heaven and its elysian fields appear, full of springing verdure, the land of exquisite delight!

Such was the Mythic origin of the Eleusinian Mysteries. They were weird forms of imagination, assimilating things real with things unreal and working them up into maxims, emblems and creeds, until they assumed a priesthood and became an organization of men and women knit by the tie of secrecy which nothing but the long fluctuations of progress could unbind.

What the actual performance was at the penetralia of the Eleusinian mysteries nobody knows. We know that they were, in their prime, symbolic of the procreative energy of nature. But they were attended with certain extraordinary rites. What were these rites? They were also conducive to the science of eternal bliss.

Who secured that bliss? In answering these two questions we must return to the kernel of our theme—the labor element. To the first one of them, the answer is vague. This we know, that the rites consisted of dramatic representations of the rape of Proserpine, daughter of Ceres, goddess of the vegetable kingdom, of the fields, and labor, who was supposed to preside over the cereals and other alimentation of man. This rape was performed by Pluto; and in its emblematic mysticisms conveys the idea not only of procreation but also of immortality of the human soul.¹⁴ Whether more may still be contributed by science to these strange and intensely interesting rites is yet to be seen. As late as 1858 an important addition to our knowledge of the Eleusinian mysteries has been contributed in the discovery by Vlastos, at a village named Hagi-Constantios, of a marble slab containing an inscription including rules and regulations of the society.

The first day of the nine was celebrated perhaps partly in Athens or before the arrival at Eleusis. On the march from Athens to Eleusis the jealous outcasts who were excluded from the raptures of the scene, always ranged themselves in hostile array and belabored the marchers with stones and clubs, until the arrival of the procession at the temple of Megaron.¹⁵

The second day was called álade mustae. It was the 16th of Boedromion. It was the day of the baptism, being a march in phalanx to the sea. The procession here received their baptism and purification. The third was the day of the feasting. On the fourth day the poppey seeds were administered. This rite represented the stupefying influence of the narcissus under which the maiden Persephone was stolen away. Orpheus was the hierophant or priest whose duty it was to initiate eligible candidates into the mysteries. He was assisted by Erechtheis daughter of Erechtheus the smasher. It is quite likely that this initiating ceremony was some kind of violent struggle. It must have been attended by oaths of fidelity under punishment of death to any one who divulged the secret. The initiation took place in the night or in the dark crypt of the temple, as the dadouchos or torch-bearer was in attendance and his torch-procession represented the search for the lost daughter of Ceres. This dadouchos was a priest holding, as Xenophon tells us, the office hereditarily for life; and at his decease it fell to another of the same family, the Callidae. There was also a great sacrificial rite performed, who or what the victim, is not very clear; but the herald of the sacrifice, the hieroceryx was always there.¹⁶ The new initiates were not permitted to eat flesh. Even the hierophant or initiating priest was required to live on low diet that passion might be restrained during the ordeal.¹⁷ He drank a decoction of hemlock which had the effect to benumb the sensibilities, a thing exceedingly appropriate at the moment of this extatic enjoyment, where, if we are to believe Maury, a critic well credited and much quoted on this subject, all around, the voluptuous nobles of both sexes take their turns. The unscrupulous dictionnaire universel,¹⁸ quoting from the above

¹⁴ Uwaroff, Essai sur les mystères d'Éleusis, 3rd. édition, Paris, 1816; Crenzer's Symbolik und Mithologie der alten Völker; Preller, Demeter und Persephone, Hamburg, 1887.

¹⁵ For a description of the temple of Megaron at Eleusis, see Guhl and Koner, Life of the Greeks and Romans, translated by Hueffer, pp. 48-9. The dark crypt where the mysteries were performed by the Mysterai also the initiations, was under ground. From Aristophanes (Plato, Bekk. L. ed. Repub. in cap. xvii.), we learn that at the initiations they sacrificed a hog. Aristophanes, Pax, v. 873-5, has the passage hinted at.

¹⁶ Creuzer, Symbolik und Mythologie der alten Völker,

¹⁷ Larousse, Dictionnaire Universel, Art. Les Eleusiniens.

¹⁸ "On representait dans une sorte de drame hieratique le rapt de la fille Proserpine. On passait par le veritable rencontre du sacrement." Art. Mystères Eleusiniens. For an account of this extraordinary symbolism among the aboriginal Americans see Bancroft's Native Races, III. p. 507. Is it not a possible thing that this symbolism may have come to the Aleuts and Pepiles from custom as ancient and original as the Eleusinian mysteries? Bancroft says: "The Pepiles abstained from their wives * * * * previous to sowing, in order to indulge * * * * to the fullest extent on the eve of that day, evidently with a view to initiate or urge the fecundating powers of nature. It is even said that certain persons were appointed to perform the sexual act at the moment of planting the first seed. During the bitter cold nights of the Hyperborean winter, the Aleuts, both men and women joined hands 'n the open air and whirled perfectly naked round certain idols, lighted only by the pale moon. The spirit was supposed to hallow the dance with his presence. There certainly could have been no licentious element in this ceremony, for setting aside the discomfort of dancing naked with the thermometer at zero, we read that the dancers were blindfolded, and that decorum was strictly enforced. In Nicaragua, maize sprinkled with blood drawn from the genitals was regarded as sacred food." Additionally to this fact, Bancroft says, (III, p. 506, quoting Palacio, Corta, p. 84) author has no hesitation in hinting that the great secret which in this case was a veritable sanctum sanctorum, was nothing less than a wild scrambling and voluptuous erotomania, such as might happen after a feast of wine. Within these penetralia are thus said to have happened an exuberance of voluptuousness, a struggle to feign escape, an agony and a glory of fullest effulgence emblematically representing each, in turn, the process of nature from the time seed is sown in autumn, through the gloom and struggle of winter to the genial spring when the new cereals burst from their first verdure, to their harvest for the nourishment of man. At any rate it is ascertained as certain that there were the course errante, the thalamos or pastos, the veil of the epoptai,¹⁹ and all solemnly conducted under the eye of the hierophant and Erechtheis, the priest and priestess of the mysteries. Maury²⁰ declares that an entrance into the fourth degree of the Eleusinian mysteries not only secured to the initiate a positive guaranty against the dreaded supplicium of Tartarus, or the lower hell, but it insured his felicity in this life also.²¹

This sketch of the great Eleusinian games may appear to the reader an aberration from our theme, the history of the laborers of ancient times. Not so; for it prepares the way to the student of history from a sociologic point of view, to become acquainted with the grievances the poor were forced to submit to. To be born a degraded wretch, a mere instrument, usable by a master owning one as a thing and handling that thing, its labor, its destiny as an earthy tool, is to a being possessed of sensibility and reason, a grievance. It is slavery. When this slave grows into the reasoning being he inwardly rebels against the men and the institution by which he is held in bondage. He is wise enough to foresee that his only chances of wriggling out of bondage and of securing riddance from its grievances is by some of the aboriginal inhabitants of Honduras and Mexico: "The frequent occurrence of the cross, which has served in so many and such widely separated parts of the earth as the symbol of the life-giving, creative, and fertilizing principle in nature, is, perhaps one of the most striking evidences of the former recognition of the reciprocal principles of nature by the Americans: especially when we remember that the Mexican name for the emblem tonaca-quahuitl, signifies 'tree of one life or flesh.'" institution of his own; some court of appeal. Political institutions have never given the workingman a court of appeals. The workingman has never yet had a hearing;²² and his reason and experience both point to the terrible fact that no hearing is possible except before his own court of appeals. The trade union is, per se, a true court of appeals. We have seen that the isolated gens or family of nobles, when threatened by the dangers of a growing population, by pirates, by slave insurrections and feuds, organized themselves into phratries, curias, kingdoms, empires and thus found means of submitting their grievances to courts of justice for settlement. We have also means of knowing that the laboring element had, on the other hand, commenced the organization of their forces. Of the former there is sufficient proof; of the latter, as students in the phenomena of ancient social life, we glean here and there fresh proof from inscriptions on tablets of stone which have survived the heedless ages, enabling us to search anew the hitherto vaguely deciphered meanings of expressions of the ancient chroniclers, finding here and there trophies of incalculable worth; all going to show that the ancient laborers, although hated and hunted everywhere and very early, also formed unions and other courts of appeal against grievances. We find evidence too, that these organizations commenced very early—perhaps coeval with the political organization of the nobles, or even before.

¹⁹ Plato, Phædrus, 250, c.; Böckh, Inscr. 1.

²⁰ Maury, Histoire des Religions de la Grèce Antique.

²¹ Plato tells us of the sufferings of those who fail to obtain purgation at the mysteries. Republic, lib. II. cap. 7. L. edition.

But the labor movement of this nineteenth century surrounded by an infinitely more luminous moral atmosphere, is little likely to understand what could possibly have been the grievance of the ancient working people against the Eleusinian games. What objections, men will say, could working people, ignorant as they were in those times, have had to any means of salvation, soul and body, from suffering.²³ This brings the matter pertinently before us! The Eleusinian mysteries were simply a religious rite, founded amid the ignorance of an ancient period of our forefathers' existence. For that era it was enlightened. What then, could the lowly who performed the world's drudgery, have encouraged, in opposition to it?

²² See Bristed, Resources of the United States, p. 103, ed. 1818 and his reference to the dismal failure of Lycurgus in sapping the family of its loves and in encouraging cruelty.

²³ Bristed, Idem, p. 392, declares that all nations that have given themselves up to erratic irregularities, "every species of profligacy" have done so as a consequence of irreligion.

Those who thus interrogate, do so in the absence of an understanding of the question. The laboring classes, though socially degraded, had sensitive feelings. They, like their masters, were believers in the common religion and its forms. They cannot be blamed for that. But while they saw their masters favored with what they thought to be glories of religion, they found themselves utterly excluded. No one at Athens who was a slave, or his descendant could secure admittance. In far later times even christians who were the descendants of slaves and consequently mostly of the laboring element, were denied admittance. The gates, from the remotest era were arbitrarily closed against the workers who labored to produce the means of subsistence for the rich. The gorgeous telesteria, and pilasters of the great temple of Megaron, were, by the outcasts, only to be gazed upon and marveled at from a distance. The Calliades, who inherited the priesthood were all of noble blood. The common rabble might get into the caravan and through the dust and din march unobserved from Athens to Eleusis. They might, as in the procession of our modern camp-meeting, become inspired with the occasion and imbued with the frenzy of faith, or even dare to picture themselves worthy to participate. But the order of such a man's rank was soon manifested by the missiles, hisses, leers and attacks against the throng, himself included, by his own people who gathered on the wayside and threw derision and vented spite in turbulence and often force against all the crusaders alike. On his arrival his case became hopeless, for a rigid examination by officers of the law soon detected his meaner rank and caused his expulsion. None but the darlings of the family constituted gentes were deemed fit for admission to the holy altar.

We mean by this that the working man was too low in the estimation of the devotees of the Pagan temple to be the possessor of an immortal soul.²⁴ Now let the questioner consider that these outcasts were human beings of the same natural stock, against whom natural laws of heredity had made no discrimination; that they were as bright, as clear, as conscious, as well developed and intelligent as their masters, were often their masters' children; that they sometimes rose supremely to eminence despite the pitiless contempt and mountain-like obstacles they had to contend with—let the objector observe these things in a practical way and he will be furnished a true key to one cause of the dissatisfaction and counter organization of laborers of ancient times, for securing a court that might hear their appeals. The world at that period was divided into two classes, the pious and the impious,²⁵ which means the nobles, born of the gods and entitled to go back to the gods, and the earth-borns, doomed to delve for their masters and at death go back to the earth. But although this was recognized as an old belief coming from the institution of slavery in which the most liberal of men could only acknowledge them to be more than half furnished with an immortal principle,²⁶ yet the intelligence of the outcasts rebelled against it. Would not men under such circumstances naturally consider this a great grievance? In our own times, when all men are admitted to be born equal—times compared with those old days being as the dazzle of noonday to the obscurity of morning twilight—in our own free civilization the working people combine upon economic issues, their equality of right to heaven unquestioned; but those people imagined themselves suffering a humiliating grievance when the haughty disclaimer was flung into their face that they were too mean to expect either a present or a future. If then, they gnashed with anguish, or even vengeance or secretly took measures to get even with this oppression, it was but an effort to express a grievance.

²⁴ Plato, Laws, vi; Homer, Odyssey, XVII. c. 322, 323; Horace, Sermo, I. The ancient idea was that those who failed to get through the flat earth from this, the mortal side, to the other which was heaven, Elysium, perished. Plato, the great idealist wrote (Gorgias, 168-73; Phædo, 77, 139; Rep. c. 13), several intensely interesting details on the wanderings and gropings of the soul on whose waxen tablet is indelibly stamped virtues and sins for Rhadamanthus and the

We make these statements to show why in ancient times the labor movement took different phases from these we see on every hand about us. We do this because we are about to bring forward proof that there existed an opposition to other post mortem judges to examine. Those, such as slaves supposed to have no souls, were denied even a burial. They were burned.

²⁵ Consult chapter 3 of Granier's Hist. des Classes Ouvrières, pp. 48-71. The critic should carefully study his magnificent array of notes.

²⁶ Plato, Laws, ix. half a soul; Tim., xviii.; lxxi. Homer, Odessey, lib XVII; Aristotle declared that the children of the noble masters, who were born slaves could be only animated beings.

the whole philosophy based on the slave code and to the religion that denied the equality of man. The first thing is to produce proof that the working people resented their exclusion from the Eleusinian mysteries.

To do this it will be necessary to indulge in a little circumlocution, as the evidence is very vague and indirect. It is in fact, new ground. However much there may lie concealed in support of this important fact which we propose to establish, it must be confessed that such evidence lies in moldering inappreciation and neglect. Did the laboring or outcast element of that ancient era resent and combine against the system that ignored them soul and body?

We have proof that they did; but in adducing this proof hold claim to the right to draw inferences from the existence and career of as many different forms of labor and socialistic organizations as we can hunt out from the gloom of tyranny and oblivion. With this range of the whole field assumed to be conceded, we shall produce before the critic what we can find of all sorts of organizations bearing upon the point, and where the link of evidence becomes broken in the chain of chronology, shall feel perfectly exonerated for drawing upon the plausibly imaginative in order to restore that link. The fact that, as an anthropologist we are undertaking to write a history of ethics from a standpoint of sociology, entitles us to a right to scientifically use all the strategy of comparative testimony. By these remarks is meant the trade union, the co-operative society, the burial society, the society for social amusement among the lowly, the agrarian foment, the social wars, even to some extent the sophist and Pythagorean socialism, the ascetic Essenianism and finally the grand culmination of all, Christianity. All these strictly belong to the true social history of the ancient lowly; for all their membership was originally of freedmen and slave origin.

In order to answer the question properly it is necessary to glance a moment at the social history of the Grecian peninsula. As early as 1055 B. C. there had been a horrible murder or massacre of the Helots or slaves and their descendants at Sparta. It was in the mythical ages; but great events even among the poor and ignorant have a certain faculty of transmitting their history through tradition. It has come down to us through poetry and song, through hints of ancient history, through honest Plutarch, and we are assured as to the assassinations which were from time to time perpetrated upon the defenseless working people of that time. We also know that these poor creatures who were to the body politic of those people what the bones are to the body, had unions for self protection. Still further it is known that they enjoyed the right to organize. It has been ascertained that the slaves themselves actually possessed protective societies²⁷ and considering the free and intelligent classes whence they were derived it is quite natural that they should have possessed them. Especially is this possible among the helots or slaves of Lacedæmon. They were, as we have seen, slaves by inheritance, often their wealthy masters' own children. They were prisoners of war, forcibly reduced to that wretched condition by being beaten in the war with Helos; and later in the great Messenian war, when Sparta became the victor in that conflict, those brave, proud, ingenious Greeks along with all of the two above mentioned classes, were humiliated, subjugated, degraded to the same servile condition. But although the body was bowed down to servitude, the mind remained to play its fancies, to plot and plan, to concoct in secret; and language was also theirs—a facile tongue—rich in versatility of idiom; full of thrilling nuance and touching charm. The powerful physique was there, the love of adventure, the Greek cravings for a better lot, with fortitude, dash and intrepidity which form the gallant characteristics of that grand people—all these the workingmen of high antiquity possessed. More than this, they had intelligence enough to know that the cruelties they suffered were unjust. If then, we hear through the scintillations of the fragments that there were uprisings, social turmoils and wars, we know them to have been the natural outcome of such a state of things, and nothing to be wondered at.

²⁷ It is known that they did at a later period; Cf. Lüders, Die Dionysischen Künstler, S. 22 & 47. This author mentions a very interesting inscription (Böckh, Corpus Inscriptionum Græcarum. I. p. 417), that has come to light, at or near Pergamum, which shows that slaves belonged to the eranoi or union of mechanics. On page 46, Lüders says "Bezeichnend für den Charakter des Vereinswesens der späteren Zeit ist es, dass auch Sklaven nicht allein an einem Eranos sich betheiligen, sondern auch unter sich ein religiöses Collegium mit Unterstützungscasse bilden durften. Für den von Sklaven benutzten Eranos bieten zahlreiche Beispiele die unlängst in Delphi gefundenen Freilassungsurkunden. Das Collegium Rhodischer Sklaven zu Ehren des Zeus Atabyrios (Διὸς Ἀταβυριασταὶ τῶν τὰς πόλιος δούλων"). So also in p. 47, Lüders further corroborates the facts that slaves belonged to the unions: "Dass aber Vereine von einiger Bedeutung auch Sklaven zur Bedienung hatten, ist natürlich; Kraton hatte als Präster des von ihm gestifteten Collegiums der Attalisten testamentarisch dem Thiasos unter anderem Tempel- und Hausgeräth auch Sklaven vermacht. Auf den Reliefs aus Nicæa haben wir in den um das Mahl beschäftigten und in den Musicirenden Personen Sklaven erkannt." On page 22, Lüders has already mentioned this Kraton, in proof of the membership as slaves: "Kraton, günstling der Attalen und hochangesehenes Mitglied und Priester der grossen Synodus Dionysischer Techniten in Teos, hatte nach seiner glänzenden Aufnahme an dem Hofe von Pergamos dort aus dem Verbands der Künstler einen Verein von Thiasoten zu Ehren der Pergamenischen Könige gestiftet, dessen Mitglieder sich Ἀτταλιστᾶι nennen." Farther on in the same page, he shows that Kraton made the union a present of his own slaves when he died; probably, as Foucart shows that they sometimes did, (Mém. sur l'affranchissement des esclaves par forme de vente à une divinité p. 28), in order to set them free. "In seinem Testamente endlich, von dem uns, so wie von jenem Briefe, ein Fragment erhalten ist, vermacht er dem Verbands eine ansehnliche Geldsumme, damit sie aus den Zinsen ihre Opfer und festlichen Zusammenkünfte bestritten den Statuten gemäß (καθὼς ἐν τῇ νομοθεσίᾳ πρὸς ἑκάστην διατέτακται). Das Mobiliar des Vereinshauses, das Geschirr zu den Opfern und Mahlzeiten und der feierlichen Pompe, das in dem erhaltenen Theile des Testament aufgezählt wird, hinterliess er dem Verein nebst einer Anzahl Sklaven zu dauerndem Besitze."

Now we have promised to adduce proof that there were unions of Greeks who resisted the public insult of the great Eleusinian mysteries which denied to the slaves and their descendants, the freedmen, all hope of happiness here and hereafter.²² We simply desire, in order to clear up the vagaries, to consider, in our inquiry, the whole of Greece at a time.

Scanning the social condition of the slaves from evidence, we find plenty of assurance that they belonged to the state. The state leased them out. The state, from the primitive family, was organized for purposes of defense.²³ The family first possessed the slave. Slaves became more numerous than families. They did all the labor and were allowed no privileges. So they rebelled. Some ran away, hid in fastnesses, became dangerous brigands. They became organized. Then the rich families organized themselves into fratries and other forms. As the slaves had belonged to the families, so now they belonged to the fratries. This means that as the slaves were before private property, so now they, or some of them, became public property, This was a political sequence upon the organization of the families into fratrics and the consolidation of the fratrics into the state. Of course the rich family still kept as many servants as it needed; but large numbers remained with the public domain. These state slaves formed into organizations." From the earliest mythical accounts down to 58 years before Christ we find evidences abundantly proving that the law gave work-people the especial right to organize not only in Rome but also in Greece. The celebrated Law of the Twelve Tables which specified the manner of organization of workingmen, is declared by the commentators to be a translation from the Greek laws of Solon."

²² Plutarch, Theseus, speaks of the demagogue Menestheus who, about 1180 before Christ rose up against the tyranny of the aristocrats at Athens, with the claim that the people also had a right to be initiated into the Eleusinian mysteries. Even at that remote period there must have been between the poor and lowly and the rich and lordly, great struggles regarding this grievance.

²³ Morgan, Ancient Society, chap. ii : Drumann, Arbeiter und Communisten in Griechenland und Rom, S. 24: "In Epidamnus gab es keine Handwerker als die öffentlichen Sklaven." "Das Handwerk ist daher verrufen und verachtet." S. 26; Aristotle, Politics, II. 4, § 13.

The Twelve Tables clearly set down the arrangement, ordaining that the trade unions should remain in obedience to the law of the state. The unions followed the law, and Gaius wrote the law thus fixed, so plainly that Justinian incorporated it into the digest. A fragment of the law of Solon" shows plainly that trades unions were common and tolerated by that lawgiver. A strong cumulative evidence that the slaves belonging to the state were enormously organized into protective association, is found in the fact that they succeeded in their insurrections against the masters. An important example of these slave insurrections is given of the miners." In Attica they once rebelled, and marched upon the town near the silver mines, occupying the castle of Sunion. These people were called "thetes" or "demos."

In Athens the fact of their manumission did not make them anything above mere earth-borns. They could develop genius, become teachers, philosophers, poets and business men. Sometimes they rose to positions of wealth, even themselves becoming master-builders, and some of them were the greatest sculptors and painters the world ever produced; but the taint of servility was born in their blood. Phidias the most celebrated sculptor, ancient or modern, was a descendant of the slaves. He was

³⁰ Lüders, Dionysischen Künstler. S. 46; Wescher-Foucart Inscriptions de Delphes, pp. 89, 107, 139, 244, giving abundant evidence.

³¹ Gaius, Digest, lib. XLVII tit. xlii lex. 4; Plutarch, Numa.

³² Granier, Histoire des Classes Ouvrières &c. pp. 283-7.

³³ Consult the Encyclopedias, Articles on Slavery; also for instances of Asiatic slaves joining the rebellion of Aristonicus, see Infra, chapter ix.

really a freedman. He built the propylae of the Parthenon, and with his skillful hand made the beautiful and colossal statues of Athena and the wonderful chryselephantine statue of the Olympian Zeus. Parrhasius, one of the finest painters, who transmitted to the Italian schools the art of delineations, was, in all probability a freedman. Demosthenes in his terrible vehemence pronounced Æschines a son of a freedman. That alone probably had a strong tendency toward deciding the great case against Æschines, whose mighty genius, though the outcome of lowly parentage, well nigh brought to the scaffold the greatest orator of ancient or modern days. In these bright years of our nineteenth century, such scurrile slurs as Demosthenes hurled against his enemy, which were used to incite contempt, would be thought an insult upon the act of labor. Innumerable were the marvels of genius among the Greeks, and as innumerable the deprecatory innuendos, the cowardly jealousies, the surreptitious revenges that were seated and sealed in the accident of birth. Much of the greater and lesser broils may be attributed to it.

Our object in this divergence is to give, from a reading of the past, in the spirit of sociological research, the fact that the lowly of the Greek population were organized to a large extent, against this scathing grievance, the taint of labor.

That the slaves belonged in great numbers to the state is seen by any one who consults the law of Lycurgus.²⁴ It must be most distinctly understood that the great law of Lycurgus was intended only for the development and enjoyment of the two favored classes of Lacedæmonian society—the Spartans and Pericæci. He belonged to the Eurystheneid line of Spartan kings. An aristocrat by birth and according to Herodotus, living about a thousand years before our era, he would not permit the third class or working people even to taste of the advantages of his system—otherwise almost a perfect socialism if we except its heathenish immodesty and blood-thirst. The land he divided into 9,000 lots for the Spartans who were fewest in numbers, 30,000 lots for the Periceci or Laconians who were more numerous in proportion. The poor Helots or work-people and descendants from slaves got nothing although their proportionate numbers were three to one. This hegemony of Greece incorporated into itself the most degrading slavery to be found in the world's history. Lycurgus although to his favorite people perhaps in many respects a model, was towards those he arrogantly assumed to be beneath him—the laboring class—the model of a monster. His system of the ambuscade²⁵ disgusted even Plato, who was a believer in slavery. Plato's great heart turned away in loathing from such a stupendous abomination. The ambuscade, a diabolism that should blacken any age, could exist only in a country where calm, cold-blooded contempt gets the better of the warmer emotions. In looking over the lofty but ghastly eloquence of Cicero, whose implacable contempt for the working people in later times cost him his life, we have the nearest parallel to inveterate hate.

²⁴ Plutarch, Lycurgus: "It is not worth while to take much pains as to riches since they are of no account; and the Helots (slaves) who tilled the ground, were answerable for the produce mentioned." And a few lines farther on: "So much beneath them they estimated every thought of mechanic arts as well as wish for riches."

No historiographer can hereafter afford to neglect the inhuman butcheries perpetrated by the ambuscade; since they differed from the massacres of Stone Henge, of Saint Bartholomew, of the Incas, of the Mamelukes, of Wyoming, in being consummated at moments of profoundest peace; at moments when the innocent victims were wrapt in the fiendish assassins' service, sweating in the fields, at the mill, with the flocks, on the provision market, producing, garnering and distributing the food, the clothing, the shelter which their heartless butchers were consuming without gratitude, to invigorate their veins whereby to accomplish such treacheries!

Just before reciting these horrors let us revert to the victim. He was primarily the slave by the ancient family law of entail and primogeniture. The shackles of abject servitude were first inherited through the humiliating law of entails which fixed the heir of the patrimony, the first born son, as a lord to be served, worshiped, immortalized, and blessed; his children to be chattels, subjected, forced to labor, distrusted, branded and cursed.²⁶

²⁵ For more on the Crypteia, see Plutarch, Lycurgus.

²⁶ Fustel de Coulanges, Cité Antique, livre 2, La Famille; Granier de Cassagnac, Histoire des Classes Ouvrières, chap. 3.

Next, after this primary calamity came the slaves of war; whole communities taken, carried off by the captors and degraded to slavery and its concomitant curse,³⁷ as in the case of the Messenian war with Sparta. Lastly the slave trade. Three great ancient systems. Under these he suffered torments which no pen of mortal will ever portray. He was known by his dress, sometimes going in rags equivalent to nudity, in gangs under a brutal boss. Sometimes, in this condition, man along with woman, destitute of means of being decent, dragging the long day among the fields and flocks; dogskin hats and sheepskin breeches, which survive longest the wear of the wearer, and often totally nude. They were each flogged once a day as an admonition, though having committed no offence and forbidden to learn the manly arts. They were obliged to stoop and crouch in piteous obsequiousness to these drivers lest jealous tyranny interpret their upright posture to be an assumption of the estate of manhood.³⁸ Such was the condition of the workingman of Sparta which, above all other countries whereof we discover a historic trace, was the most pitiless toward the slave. And the most shameful phase of this confession is the cruel fact that all this was precept of the Lycurgan law!

We must return to the cryptia or ambushade of the law of Lycurgus. These Helots or working people, state-slaves of Lacedæmon, lived and performed much of their labor in the rural districts. The law of Lycurgus provided for the election, annually, of five magistrates or overseers, called ephorî, whose function was to strengthen and heighten the principles of democracy that the happiness of the people might be equalized. Plutarch's doubts as to whether Lycurgus instituted the ephorî seem to be dispelled by his acknowledgment that both Plato and Aristotle thought so.³⁹ One of the functions of this institution for the promotion of popular democracy was to see that the ambuscade was well carried out. All that was meant by the term people was the people who owned the land, either by parcel or as government property together with the slaves and other chattels of that property. This means that the really worthless and indolent non-producers were the people. The useful majority of the inhabitants, the working population, were entirely ignored, contemptuously denied every vestige of participation in this much boasted government, although there exists abundance of evidence that they were naturally intelligent and as worthy as their masters, of enjoying the product of their labor in this state of democracy.

³⁷ Ælian, Historia Varia, I. 1.; Athenæus, Deipnosophistæ, vi; Xenophon Memorabilia, 3, 6, § 2; Bücher, Aufstände der unfreien Arbeiter S. 36; All of these authors also Livy give evidence on the enslavement of men taken in war,

³⁸ "The Ephorî indeed, declared war against them! Against whom? Why poor, naked slaves who tilled their lands, dressed their food and did all those offices for them which they were too proud to do for themselves" Cf. Plutarch, Lycurgus, note in Laughton's tr.

³⁹ Plato, Republic, Dissertation on Lacedæmon; Aristotle, Politica, v. ascribes their origin to a later period of the law's existence than that of the Lawgiver's lifetime. Nevertheless they are the outcome of the great law of Lycurgus.

Instead of this, the ephori ordained that a certain number of young men from among the aristocrats should, at their command, arm themselves with daggers, and provided with a sort of knapsack with provisions, secretly sneak off into the mountains and jungles.⁴ The distances these legalized assassins were required to go varied very much. These youths had governors who had the power to order them to do as the ephori should determine. The governors, whenever the ephori voted a new slaughter of the working people, called together the smartest and most able bodied of these young men, armed them with daggers, sharpened and gleaming for the occasion.⁴ At the same time the inhuman overseers whom we may with due propriety call bosses, in accord with a technical signification fully adopted by the prevailing labor movement of to-day, were ordered to see to it that the toilers should be without arms or means of any kind with which to defend themselves when suddenly set upon by the amateur Spartan soldier, dagger in hand. With all these odds against them the poor, unsuspecting, half naked working people were driven by the bosses, as usual into the field, the mill, the kitchen and the various places of service wherever required to eke the drudgery of a sun-and-sun summer day of toil. Meantime the assassins were laying in wait in the vicinity for their prey. It was a manly sport! The law of Lycurgus made more compulsory than any other code on earth, the provisions of manly ⁴Plutarch, Lycurgus, where these horrors are related.

⁴Xenophon, De Bello Peloponnesiaco, liber IV. 80.

gymnastics. This was one of them. It was sport!⁴² By the exercise of this manly sport the youth's blood flowed stronger, his muscles grew, his body waxed athletic; he digested with a better relish the food his blood-begrimed victim had in the morning prepared for him before his murderous weapon slashed and pierced her gentle heart. We quote from Plutarch. No one ever speaks illy of Plutarch. His means of knowing facts were better than ours, and his kind nature even in the barbarous age in which he lived, revolted against the consistency of such a democracy. He says:⁴³

"The governors of the youth ordered the shrewdest of them from time to time to disperse themselves in the country, provided only with daggers and some necessary provisions. In the day time they hid themselves and rested in the most private places they could find; but at night they sallied out into the roads and killed all the Helots they could meet with. Nay, sometimes by day, they fell upon them in the fields and murdered the ablest and strongest of them."⁴⁴

These are specimens of authentic history of the lowly as they have passed through a transition period of unnumbered centuries, from abject slavery to a Christian democracy which recognizes all men as equal and provides for them precepts for equal enjoyment. But before quitting these chambers of cruelty and carnage it remains our sad duty to recount what modern historians well know, but seldom divulge—the great assassination. It happened during the Peloponnesian war. This account comes from the trusted and reliable historian Thucydides, who lived at the time and made it his business for many years to keenly observe what transpired, during that long and tedious struggle of seven and twenty years. The story is briefly told by him. Dressed and reflected upon in our own way it appears in substance as follows:

During the great Peloponnesian war, one of the most renowned in antiquity, the forces of the army sometimes became decimated and it was necessary to recruit them from whatever source possible. When, therefore, there were no more soldiers to be had from among the Spartans and Periceci or recognized citizens, the military authorities were obliged to call out the laboring men who, at the time of the Peloponnesian war, were three to four times more numerous than the non-laboring class. This in ancient times was always a humiliation. War was the noble occupation, labor the ignoble one. To ask a person in disgrace to assist the nobles out of trouble was equivalent to humiliating confession. If then, the laborer, in a great emergency was marshaled to the rescue, the only way to blot out the stain such a humiliation entailed was to enfranchise this warrior from social thralldom and thus stanch the blot by elevating him from the fetters of bondage. If further, the bondsman after performing the service manfully, redeeming his masters by bravery and valor, earning his liberty by saving their lives and preserving their realm from wreck, could be secretly murdered after such decree of manumission was administered, it would save the proud masters many a disagreeable jeer, painful wince and blush of shame when reminded that their existence and happiness was due to the daring and fidelity of a hated menial who still shocked their pride with his presence.

⁴² K. O. Müller in Die Dorier, denies this; but the evidence is too strong against him. Again, Müller's opinion regarding their "aboriginal descent" has been completely overturned.

⁴³ Plutarch's Lycurgus.

⁴⁴ Idem; Cf. tr. of the Langhorne. Vol. I. pp. 63-4.

It came to pass that this humiliating expedient was indispensable to save the nation from irretrievable ruin and thousands of the enslaved laborers were marshaled and drilled into the army. They were not allowed to bear heavy arms; that would have been a still greater disgrace. So they bore light arms and bore them gallantly. After serving through many a tedious campaign probably of years' duration, after winning victories in many a skirmish and in many a field and earning the full measure of their promised reward, after seeing the Lacedæmonian armies victorious at every hand and the great war prosperously advancing toward triumph for the southern Greeks, there were brought before the military tribunal for dismissal over two thousand workingmen who had proved truest in arms and been adjudged worthiest of liberty. Their faithful hands had valiantly borne the standard of an ungrateful country. Their strong hearts had never flinched either before their sullen discipline or the cleaving blades of the combatants. Their fiery zeal and fearless blows had won the victory and earned the liberty which, before this august council, proudly they heard pronounced. Over 2,000 slaves who toiled for masters were thus regularly enfranchised and marched into a temple or other enclosure or field—no mortal knows or ever will know what—to take the oath of freedom.

But the anxious wives and children waited and wept long before these brave men came to gladden their hovel homes. For here we come to the recital of one of the darkest pages of history. Still more painful is this page because blotted. Too foully blotted for perusal; since, aside from a ghastly blood-stain that smirches its story in mysterious gloom, it is written in the almost undecipherable hieroglyphs of reticent shame. Thucydides blushes for this lurid page;⁴⁵ but unlike the unmanly historians of the past who have cringed in the presence of truth which could not port the flattery of lords and masters of high degree, he bravely told us all he knew. And what he knew is enough to make the blood run cold.⁴⁶ Besides, it comes to us subscribed to by Plato,⁴⁷ Aristotle⁴⁸ and Plutarch,⁴⁹ on whose minds, if we catch aright their words, this massacre we are going to relate made an impression so strong as to waver the tone of these great philosophers' belief in slavery⁴⁷ and seriously color their dialectics.

⁴⁵ Thucydides during the Peloponnesian war for the hegemony of Greece, commanded a division of the Athenian marine force; but being out-generaled at Amphipolis by Brasidas went for twenty years into exile and during that time used his wealth and talent writing the celebrated history which has come down to us.

⁴⁶ Thucydides, De Bello Peloponnesiaco, liber IV. cap. 80. "Καὶ ἅμα τῶν Εἰλωτῶν βουλομένοις ἦν ἐπὶ προφάσει ἐκπέμψαι, μή τι πρὸς τὰ παρόντα τῆς Πύλου ἔχομένης νεωτερίσωσιν· ἐπεὶ καὶ τότε ἐπραξαν, φοβούμενοι αὐτῶν τὴν νεότητα καὶ τὸ πλῆθος (αἰεὶ γὰρ τα πολλὰ Λακεδαιμονίοις πρὸς τοὺς Εἰλωτας τῆς φυλακῆς πέρι μάλιστα καθεστήκει)· προεῖπον αὐτῶν ὅσοι ἀξιοῦσιν ἐν τοῖς πολεμίοις γεγενῆσθαι σφίσιν ἀριστοὶ, κρίνεσθαι, ὡς ἐλευθερώσοντες, πείραν ποιούμενοι καὶ ἡγούμενοι τούτους σφίσιν ὑπὸ φρονήματος, οἵπερ καὶ ἡξίωσαν πρῶτος ἕκαστος ἐλευθεροῦσθαι μάλιστα ἂν καὶ ἐπιθέσθαι. Καὶ προκρίναντες ἐς δισχιλίους οἱ μὲν ἐστεφανώσαντό τε καὶ τὰ ἱερὰ περιῆλθον ὡς ἡλευθερομένοι. Οἱ δὲ οὐ πολλῶ ὕστερον ἡφάνισάν τε αὐτοὺς καὶ οὐδεὶς ἦσθετο ὅτι τρὶς ἕκαστος διεφθάρη."

⁴⁷ Plato, De Republica, Dissertation on Model State.

⁴⁸ Aristotle, Politic, V.

⁴⁹ Plutarch, Lycurgus, cap. 28. This massacre occurred under Brasidas, in B. C. 424. Ælian, Historia Varia, I. 1, says that in Greece the superstitious belief everywhere prevailed that these cruelties to the poor slaves caused a judgment from heaven upon the Spartans, in form of an earthquake, B. C. 467, by which 20,000 people lost their lives. This must have been before the massacre described and proves the frequency of those horrible deeds of the Ephori and their tutored and organized assassins. For later comments on this earthquake at Sparta and the superstitious terrors believed to come from their cruelty to slaves, see McCullagh, Industrial History of Free Nations, I. p. 6.

This much is known that during the time these 2,000 or more soldiers were going through the ordeal of being garlanded, crowned, distinguished and conducted to the temple of the gods to receive their first beatitude, their blessing and reward for bravery, the ephori were busily and secretly making out a declaration of war, arming the valorous young men and giving them instructions to crawl cat-like upon them with the assassin's daggers! No more is known; for here the page is torn beyond recovery. But enough is known. The happy braves all disappear forever. Naught but a dark and spectral mystery broods over this page of history. The workingmen had received the emoluments of their hire at the hand of an assassin democracy!

The careful student of history from a standpoint of social science may pick up evidence that to some extent even the Helots were organized. Facts continually crop out in the records showing that these degraded doers of Spartan labor under the law of Lycurgus, unable to resist the exactions, raised insurrections against their tormentors, and that they sometimes got the better of them. In almost every other part of Greece they are known to have been organized into many forms of associative self-support by which they were able to command more respect. We return to Athens.

The fact must not be lost sight of that at Athens as everywhere among the Aryans, there were two distinct classes by birth—the nobles, claiming to be descended from the gods, and the earth-borns who went back to earth. The first would not work if they could possibly avoid it; at least this may be said of the men. The latter did most of the work; not only the menial drudgery but the skilled labor of building the magnificent temples and other public edifices whose imposing ruins are still a wonder of the now living age. To the credit of woman in high life be it said that sometimes the materfamilias spun and wove, according to some testimony of Plato. There are two important facts to be considered: In Greece, Rome and elsewhere in Europe and western Asia, northern Africa and the islands, the working people greatly outnumbered the non-workers. In Greece they were three and four times more numerous. Again, they were often chattles of that state. The land belonged to the state and the laborers who tilled the land went with it. This as we shall see, became in Italy, under the generous laws of Numa, a great benefit for them which they enjoyed for about 500 years. In Greece the land also belonged to the state; but the cruel law of Lycurgus which was instituted 1,000 years before Christ and held good, as Plutarch tells us for 500 years, treated the poor creatures with such flagitious absolutism that they could never enjoy so well as did the Roman laborers, the boon of their own organization.

The law of Lycurgus was pernicious in its inculcation of the two moral elements of Plato; those of irascibility and concupiscence without sympathy. When a master owns a slave from whom he expects to receive labor product, he finds it for his own advantage to treat him well; otherwise he would not receive the full product of the man's labor; but when the land belonged to the state and the slaves also, this personal responsibility was smothered with it. Thus hatred and contempt, attributes of Plato's irascible impulse, constituting one of the bases of moral philosophy, were for ages allowed to develop in the breast of the Spartan. Again, concupiscence or desire, being common or national under the Lycurgan law, was averted from its natural competitive course by a communism of gratification without responsibilities and a communism of participation; and these with idleness and all the depravity which such deteriorating influences entail, lowered Spartan morality below the plain of sympathy. This unfeeling and inhuman condition of the public mind became a natural result ultimately destroying the otherwise unhindered plan of Lycurgus.

Had the law of Lycurgus provided for absolute equality of all men, slave and noble alike, had its communism applied to all on exactly equal footing, the common ownership could have been carried out by the state with greater general happiness and all the cruelty which depraved Spartan life would have been saved to the credit of a splendid people. But that would have been a death blow to the Pagan religion, itself based upon egoism and possible only under a system of lords and slaves. Thus, with the exception of the taint of labor and its concomitant wrongs to the human race, the ancients began radically. They began by having the family egoism of the primordial hearthstone—the first ownership—subdued into common ownership of land and even of children; and had they banished that hideous curse, the taint of labor and added to their other and truly virtuous methods of self culture, the enobling, healthful and thrift-bearing practice of impartial economical labor as a necessary requisite to sanity and wealth they would have taught the world a lesson of advancement instead of one in degeneracy and shame. The same must be said of Athens and the other Grecian states except that none of them are known to have been so cruel and heartless as the Spartans under the Lycurgan law.

We have thus sufficiently shown the grievance borne by the ancient working people inciting and goading them to organization. It now remains to be proved that the Greeks of this class, were actually in a substantial state of combination, especially the Athenians, during the existence of the Eleusinian games near Athens; a point which throughout the chapter has been the subject in kernel, of our inquiry. This substantiated, we have a startling clue to the causes from a sociological standpoint, of two historical phenomena: the social wars and the advent of our era.

Every recent investigation reveals fresh slabs or drags from the depths of time, earth and oblivion something in proof. Dr. Schliemann, quotes a passage of Homer which shows an explanation comprehensible to us in no other way than that there existed an understanding at that ancient day, between the lower people. A peddler came to the palace with a gold collar set with amber beads, and Homer sang a beautiful verse describing the knowing look that the young prince saw exchanged between the man and the servant woman in the hall while the queen was admiring the amber necklace.⁵⁰ These were the nods and winks ⁵⁰ Schliemann, Tiryns; The Pre-historic Palace, p. 368, containing the passage from Homer. This also suggests that the working people, including house servants, were secretly in league at Mycenæ and that the league reached as far as Phœnicia.

ἦλυσ' ἀνὴρ πολυΐδρις ἐμοῦ πρὸς δώματα πατρός, χρύσειον ὄρμον ἔχων, μετὰ δ' ἠλέκτροισιν ἔερτο· τὸν μὲν ἄρ' ἐν μελάρῳ δμῳαὶ καὶ πότνοα μήτηρ χερσὶν τ' ἀμφαφόμεντο, καὶ ὀφθαλμοῖσιν ὁρῶντο, ἔκρον ὑπισχόμενας· ὁ δὲ τῇ κατένευσε σιωπῇ· ἦτοι ὁ κἀννεύσας κοίλῃν ἐπὶ νῆα βεβήκει."

of the secret society which were observed but could not be read by the lad. This was in the second millennium before Christ.

Granier, who must have been a great hunter of facts, observes that slavery was originally of the family; not of violent origin,⁵¹ precisely what Dr. Fustel de Coulanges has since proved beyond refutation of the most probing commentators seeking contrary evidence.⁵² Of course history gives ponderous testimony that violence was a source of enslavement; but that was not the origin. When our era opened it brought with it an inestimable boon; a pearl of great price; the utter extinction of social class⁵³—nothing less than the long sought revolution. Dr. Cliffe Leslie in an introduction to M. De Laveleye's "Primitive Property," observing the progress of this greatest of all the revolutions which he rightly sees is yet far from being realized though nearly all civilized races have repudiated the curse of slavery, takes the entirely correct view with regard to ownership after the momentous but gradual revolution is past.⁵⁴

It is known that in early Greece the hetairai and the hetairoi were female and male associates of the laboring class, and that they had their legalized association for mutual benefit. From very early times they used their associations, not only for mutual protection against oppression but also for mutual improvement and pleasure.⁵⁵

The celebrated jugglers were mostly members of an organization under whose auspices they used their jugglery as a trade wherewith to gain a living. These are of almost incredibly ancient origin and in Greece many of them were descendants of Egyptian slaves. It is not difficult to prove that at an epoch since which an æon of time has

⁵¹ Histoire des Classes Ouvrières, p. 33: "In conclusion, everything leads in the plainest manner to the belief that slavery had no other beginning than that of the family entailment of which it constituted an economic part."

⁵² La Cité Antique, liv. II. chap. vii. pp. 76-89.

⁵³ Paul, Epistle to the Gallatians, chap. iii. verse 28; "There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female; for ye are all one in Jesus Christ."

⁵⁴ Primitive Property, Introduction, p. xxi. "The owners of property are on the eve of becoming a powerless minority; for the many, to whom the whole power of the state is of necessity gravitating, see all the means of subsistence and enjoyment afforded by nature in the possession of the few." Cliffe Leslie.

⁵⁵ Guhl and Koner, Life of the Greeks and Romans, pp. 268-269, showing Greek customs and manners at a symposion. Other evidence testifies to there being a secret organization at these feasts, which conducted the ceremonies. See also Lüders, Die Dionysischen Künstler, passim.

rolled over the human race, those jugglers were plying their profession the same as at a much later era in which we find them at Athens.⁵⁵ The professional business of these jugglers and tumblers was to amuse the people; and there are abundant inscriptions and pictures to be found on vases and other pieces of pottery which show that they worked hard to earn their money. These were specimens of the slave system which marks the despotic rule, and existed first. All remote antiquity bears evidence, in prehistoric inscriptions and inkings of different nature, of many slaves, and that labor was degraded.⁵⁶ The slaves being first, there came about an era of manumissions. Freedmen entered upon the scene bearing the taint of slave labor and were obliged to resort to all sorts of industry and wit to make a living; and among other methods adopted to secure that end, they entered into mutual alliances with each other for common assistance through trade organizations. There were great numbers also of the *communia mimorum*⁵⁷ or unions of comic actors who in a similar manner got a living by amusing the people. Strabo speaks of them⁵⁸ and Böckh gives the Greek of an interesting institution of this kind.⁵⁹ Mommsen gives the law recorded in the digest from Gaius, which afterwards suppressed most of these societies.⁶¹

A curious union was that of the Urinatores, men whose business at Rome was to dive in the Tiber and probably

⁵⁵ "An attempt has been made to mathematically measure this vast period of time by calculating from the depth of mud of the alluvial Nile, at which objects have been found, by L. Horner, on The Alluvial Land of Egypt, and results published in the Phil. Transactions, 1858, p. 75, which gives 12,000 years, at the assumed rate of deposit of three and five tenths inches per 100 years at Memphis, from the fragments of vases found 70 feet under ground." Sir Gardner Wilkin-on, Ancient Egyptians, vol. I. pp. 8-9., note, paraphrased.

⁵⁷ Cf. Bancroft, Native Races, vol. IV. Antiquities, pp. 365-6, showing that in the remote past of Central America, inscriptions exhibiting the most despotic conditions were produced, probably thousands of years before the discovery of the present nomadic races who were found in a semi-communal state. At Palenque are inscriptions on the ancient walls showing conditions coeval with the earliest European monarchism. A king garbed in fine military attire, and the everlasting slaves on bended knees and in humble suppliance. They are freely drawn, with art superior to Egyptian, being in bas reliefs, in stucco on the walls of the palace.

⁵⁸ Mommsen, De Collegiis et Sodalitibus Romanorum, p. 83: "Communia mimorum Romanorum et in nomina et in institutis τὰ κοινὰ τῶν περὶ τὸν Διονύσιον τεινῶν referunt, quæ apud Græcos ampla et plurima fuerunt."

⁵⁹ Strabo, Geographica, XIV. 643, 28.

⁶⁰ Corpus Inscriptionum Græcarum, nos. 349 and 2931.

⁶¹ Mommsen; De Coll. et Sodal. Romanorum, p. 84. Great numbers of these societies existed about the Hellespont and among the Ionian Islands.

also into the public baths in search of things lost by the grandees while boating or bathing.⁶² At Naples, Nice and other places on the sea these divers had unions and no doubt possessed skilled men who succeeded in restoring the valuables after the wrecks of triremes, and other craft.⁶³ Especially were these unions a benefit to community at Syracuse, the Piræus and Byzantium, where these and other unions abounded in great numbers. Mommsen on the law of Solon also declares that there were both sacred and civil communes,⁶⁴ and he further states that all such societies were not only permitted, but they possessed at that early period (B. C. 600), the right of perpetual organization. The probability is that these organizations had existed from a much earlier epoch than that of Solon; but having never done any harm at Athens and the Athenians being a much more sympathetic people than the Spartans, they were never molested. So long as the trade unions of the world, ancient and modern, have restricted themselves to mere pleasure, religion, and frugality, they do not appear to have been harshly dealt with; but so soon as they ventured to consider and act upon the subject of politics, which of all others, was most necessary to their welfare, they became objects of hate and of repression. Especially was this the case in ancient times; because politics like war, was a noble calling. Petty frugality, and crude convivial, as well as burial ordeals were too trifling and mean in the eyes of the nobles to attract attention.

There was at Athens a class of public servants.⁶⁵ They were not real slaves although public property, and treated as menials; never being allowed to participate in the slightest degree in the principle of government and yet they actually performed all the routine labor of the government. At the time we hear of them through public records and through inadvertent mention by historians, they seem to resemble freedmen. They received a small salary to keep them alive, and their business was to keep the books and do the various duties of a public office under government.

⁶² Orellius, Inscriptionum Latinarum Selectarum Amplissima Collectio, No. 4115: "Ti. Claudio Esquil. Severo Decuriali licetore. . . . sportulæ viritim dividantur præsertim cum navigatio scapharum diligentia ejus adquisita et confirmata sit. Ex decreto ordinis corporis piscatorum et urinatorum totius alvei Tiberis quibus ex SC. coire licet." The inscription was found in Rome.

⁶³ "Notabilis est hoc loco lex Solonis, ex qua sacra civiliaque communia non alio jure fuerunt quam quo societates ad negotiationem præditionemve constitutæ." Mommsen, De Collegiis et Sodalitiis Romanorum, p. 39.

⁶⁴ Consult Dr. Hermann, Political Antiquities of Greece, paragraph 147.

They had their protective unions. Being clerks, and constantly in presence of polite people, they made a genteel appearance and were apt in the civilities of court. But like all their class they also had a grievance. They were treated as menials because they were not "blooded;" and consequently could not pit their natural genius and ability against that of their masters who conducted the public offices and who belonged to noble stock. "It was required that Archons and priests should prove the purity of their descent as citizens for three generations."⁶⁶ The business of the Pagan temple was a part of the state affairs: and consequently priests in those times were public officers. Priests were politicians. One of the qualifications of the Archons or rulers was to have a good record that they attended to religious ceremonies. Ostracism, banishment and death were among the punishments designated by the law for neglecting these duties of citizenship; and the least whisper against any of the gods or the regulations of the Pagan religion was blasphemy. This explains the causes of that great difference in station which existed without regard to the business qualifications of the men. Smart workingmen without rights, or any claim to rights, were often required on a mean salary to do all the work of both departments of governments without being entitled to the least benefit in either, while a tyrant and sensualist held all control and honor like some modern sinecurists of our offices. There is evidence that this exclusivism was regarded by the poor workmen as a great grievance; but their exclusion from free participation in religious rights and especially from membership in and access to the Eleusinian mysteries was the greatest one. Against these grievances they were organized in secret.

Dionysius of Halicarnassus mentions a society of the Thiasotes or Greek labor unions, the members of which had for their patron deity the goddess Minerva through the noble family of the Nautii, who brought the image of Minerva away from the Trojans to Italy.⁶⁶ Here it appears that the union was not permitted to worship their goddess directly but had to approach her through a noble family. By worshiping the borrowed proxy they got access indirectly to the object of their reverence. This statement is valuable as it sheds light upon what in those early times is thus proved to have been felt as a grievance; and shows that it was imperative on the part of the unrecognized working people to organize and take counsel with each other on what they considered a most important matter, the right of worship, from which they were excluded on account of their reputed meanness of birth. The existence or non-existence of this soul depended upon it. Dirksen in his Twelve Tables points to Gaius in proof that the hetairai and the sodales were one and the same organization;⁶⁷ the former being in Greece and the latter in Italy. He further states that a comparison with the law of Solon proves that they were tolerated and their actions encouraged, if not regulated by him. The Twelve Tables are now known to be contemporaneous with, if not a translation from the law of Solon; and the law of Solon was a paraphrase of the still more ancient law of Amasis an Egyptian king.

⁶⁶ Idem, §. 148. The δοκιμασία, or scrutiny into the antecedents of candidates, is here explained.

⁶⁶ Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Antiquitates Romanae, VI. 69.

Nor was this organization common to Rome and Greece. Granier says: "Trades Unions existed since the time of Solomon, and among the Greeks from the time of Theseus."⁶⁸ In the time of Joshua, B. C. 1537-1427, they are spoken of. We have evidence regarding an organization that attempted a resistance to the overbearing nobles, in time of Agis I. These were Helots. The insurrection did not succeed, for it appears that the king caused their murder in large numbers. Agis I. was one of the mythical Spartan kings and is believed to have reigned more than a thousand years before Christ. This great massacre of the helots took place 1055 years before Christ. Traditionally the event came down to the era of writing as something mysterious and terrible. When at last, it entered the chronicles of historians it was dim in detail and being a subject which gave pain instead of pleasure—one of those servile episodes which early history appears to have preferred to leave unwritten—we unfortunately have only a few faint records which have struggled through the mists of high antiquity and gleam darkly through sullen tradition and venturesome historic jottings upon us. But the murder of the helots by order of Agis I. is spoken of by many authors as having occurred B. C. 1,055 or thereabout. After that event they became adscripti glebae, public property attached to the soil.

⁶⁷ They had in Greece the σύνδοτοι (communists), who ate at the common table, the ὁμότατοι (burial societies), the διασώται (disciples of the doctrine of mutual love).

⁶⁸ Granier de Cassagnac, Histoire des Classes Ouvrières, chap. xli.

The student of history from a standpoint of sociology, would, however, be glad to obtain more light upon that event; because we want to know what was the origin of the Aristotelian philosophy and the surroundings that motivated it.

Of all the philosophies or systems of arrangement as a basis of enduring polity, the chrematistics of Aristotle, properly understood, is sure to be that which any and all great labor movements cannot but adopt. The sociologist, who intelligently scans the evolution of our race on the enormous scale in which things are presented to him by the vicissitudes of the lowly and downtrodden poor who have fed and enriched the non-laboring few from earliest ages, cannot but wonder how a rich and fortunate man, an aristocrat, a believer in slavery, a dialectician, and one who spurned the menial, who counceled and advised the mightiest of monarchs, could have settled down in the conclusion that there is only one way of getting at truth and that is by beginning at small things and through them, in tireless investigation and experiment, learn to know and improve. Yet all who study the logic of this man, as laid down by him, are irresistibly led to traverse the very path which he opened with the keen edge of his slashing knife of reason. He “discriminated between the several faculties;—the nourishing, feeling, concupiscent, moving and reasoning powers of animal organism and attempted to explain the origin of these powers within the body, and build his morals and politics on the peculiarities of human organization.”⁶⁹ Everything according to Aristotle, if we would positively know, must be founded on close observation of facts. His eudaimonia was attained only through the bliss that rewards mind or reason when it achieves truth by indefatigable experiment and experience. He would have men acquire all knowledge by study of humble facts, and lay down therefrom a true basis of political economy. Nothing, not even the servile race, the slaves, the freedmen, the workingmen, was so mean but Aristotle could enrich his mind by studying it.

⁶⁹ American Encyclopædia, Art. Aristotle.

Here lies concealed from all eyes except those of the student of man from the standpoint of sociology, a phenomenon. Why did Aristotle adopt opposite conclusions from Plato, his old master? Plato believed largely in the theory that only the unseen gods dwelling in the etherial abodes, could impart to man absolute knowledge. Aristotle dared believe and teach that knowledge could only be had by observation and experiment with little things; for they were the beginnings. The poor workingman, then infinitesimally little as Aristotle believed him, was the beginning, being the author of labor product and consequently worthy of observation and study. This was the first encouragement the unappreciated maker and producer of all means of life ever received from a philosopher.⁷⁰ In all ages the workingman has been an unobserved factor. He is of the earth; this he has himself acknowledged, whatever claims the idler may have filed in his own behalf to the contrary. Being of earth, he digs and cultivates it and from his labor springs the fruit which when ripe and harvested is eaten and enjoyed by the idler. He built edifices which have survived the decompositions of time and his master enjoyed them. But more important and more obscure are the fine details he performed which, though often considered too mean to mention, were in reality as now, the very bulwark of human existence and though too obscure to attract attention were in reality the foundation of all nourishment, achievement, history and knowledge. The great philosopher saw this. He studied nature; and the workingman, recognized as an element of nature, was watched by him. The numerous mutual societies and union of resistance existing about the philosopher came in for a share of investigation and were seen to be the deeply underlying fundament of all whence the whole superstructure of society rose. Without the little, and humble, too unappreciated producer the world would be a wilderness of forests and wild beasts. Hence, as all came from humble toil, so the toil of investigation and experiment, however mean and unworthy the rich might esteem it, was the very most necessary of all things to resort to in order to arrive at truth, improvement and correct government. This is the basis of the philosophy of Aristotle. The world is following it to-day, led by labor; and the myriad links of invention, and discovery in experimental progress, are in exact harmony with the recommendations of the Stagerite of the Nymphæum.

⁷⁰ It has been stated that Aristotle plagiarized Kapila and certain other East Indian teachers and authors of great learning, having obtained their books while on his celebrated scientific journey of researches with the emperor Alexander the Great. The question is however, obscure. He certainly followed some of the ideas of Anaxagoras, Kapila and others.

There are some curious episodes in the life of Plato, which the ordinary reader, without system and without knowledge of the little details of life of the age he lived in, overlooks. What was the trouble with him at Syracuse? Nearly four hundred years before Christ, Plato, after varied travels, after he had written his "Theætetus," and his "Statesman," and was well-known to have decided against the workingmen, to have pronounced them too vile to merit a better fate than bondage, and to have declared that the proper form of government was that of aristocrats and slaves, we find him at Syracuse, spurned by Dionysius, waived from his presence, and consigned to the billingsgate that fed the great city with fish.⁷¹ To be sent away from the tyrant's presence when his sole mission was to teach his majesty the honeyed sweets⁷² of his then famous philosophy, was bad; but to be relegated to the city's ban-lieues, among the brobdagnagians, and hear their ridicule, was worse. But they must have been especially disagreeable to him since he well knew that their raillery was directed against him. They were of the low-born, with little education and no urbanity; he was of the great gens family, a very Ariston, of pure stock, boasted of, among all Athenians. But they had wit and sufficient means of knowing facts, to be informed that he was the proud teacher of aristocrats, that he did not teach the lowest of the people but that he believed with the citizens of Sparta and of Athens that their slavery and humiliation were just. We also have found some evidence that these people were organized. They belonged to the four trade unions, viz: the mercenaries,⁷³ the caudicarii or boatmen and sailors, the piscatorii, fisherman and the fabri, artisans. There must also have been unions of the tax gatherers; at any rate in later times, for Cicero mentions vectigalia in connection with Verres who was governor in Sicily.⁷⁴

⁷¹ Grote, Plato and the other Companions of Socrates.

⁷² "At Platoni quum in cunis parvulo dormienti apes in labellis consedisent responsum est, singulari illum suavitate orationis fore; ita futura eloquentia provisa in infante est." Cicero, De Divinatione, I. 36.

This last fact is one very interesting to know; for it sheds fresh light upon that memorable episode in the life of Plato. The unions, finding that the tyrant Dionysius had taken an affront at Plato, and hating him themselves, were willing to conspire with the king against his life. It was probably an organization of the caudicarii whom Dionysius engaged to carry him off to Italy and their greed to make a living out of the affair was probably what saved his life. Instead of killing him as they were probably paid to do, they received an offer in Italy for him alive, which they accepted and sold Plato as a slave. He was afterwards ransomed by his friend Dion and returned to Athens a wiser man. We are not informed as to what influence this experience had upon the great philosopher; but there are gleamings which illumine our conjecture that his illustrious disciple, Aristotle, who always opposed his theories, took care to enrich his store of wisdom from the circumstance.

In early times, while the world was yet too ignorant and inexperienced to understand the advantages of arbitration and of subsisting upon peaceful rather than warlike measures, brigandage was common. It existed by international permission or common consent. The only industrial system then known was that conducted by the trade unions; for according to the regulations of Solon and king Numa, even the slaves were many times managed by overseers who were under pay of the unions. The rich citizen believed it a disgrace to labor. He made his wealth or capital work for him. Among other chattels were his slaves. But he was too high to personally conduct the labor of slaves. This was done, to a large extent, by those who were not ashamed to perform labor. Of course, then, these overseers were descendants of slaves. They were the freedmen, who on receiving their manumission struck out for themselves; and for safety and success formed themselves into unions for mutual assistance and resistance against competition, danger and abuse. Among the multitudes of occupations they assumed, are found, especially with the Grecians and Syracusians, the Phoenicians and the people inhabiting the Grecian Archipelago, that of brigands and the mercenaries. Both the brigands and mercenary systems were closely leagued into unions which upheld each other in the vicissitudes of the struggle for life. The whole system of the warlike patrician families both in Greece and Rome may be said to be one of brigandage. What is arming a multitude of idle men, disciplining them to the use of weapons and marching them into a neighboring country to destroy the products of industry but brigandage? Yet ancient history is a constant repetition of this predatory and cruel system. It was brigandage.

⁷³Grote, Hist. p. 79. The mercenary soldiers especially hated Plato who had acted the friend of Dionysius. The latter had cut down their pay, p. 86). in consequence of which they had struck. They were all organized. Cf. also, Grote's Plato, and Livy, XXV. 33.

⁷⁴Cicero, Verres. II. 3, 7: "Quoniam quasi quædam prædia populi Romani sunt vectigalia nostra atque provinciæ."

Among the sufferers from this system were oftentimes the working people; some of them slaves, but many also freedmen, belonging to unions. They were thus torn from their peaceful occupation. Possessing the long experience of association they naturally utilized this their only means of gaining a living, by becoming brigands. They turned their trade unions into bandities and learned to estrange themselves from habits of industrious peace and assume the fierce modes of marauders. They exchanged the workshop for the jungles, the mountain fastnesses, the caves and thus became fighters and guerrillas. A remarkable case of this desperation is seen in that extraordinary man Spartacus, the gladiator, of whom we shall give, in a future chapter, a complete and exhaustive history, in investigating the terrible results of Roman repression of trade unions by the conspiracy laws. It is enough here merely to mention that this tendency of ancient labor organization to reverse their habits, forsake the peaceful in-dastardies which they loved, and wander away in organized clubs seeking subsistence through plunder, was by no means a fault as such actions are now considered; for otherwise they would have immediately been seized by the conquering legions and sold into slavery. In those precarious times, therefore, brigandage was no crime, although to be caught was slavery or death. But it added a fierceness to the social aspect of the human race.

The Eleusinian mysteries caused a great deal of dissatisfaction and feud by reason of their severe, aristocratic exclusiveness which often wounded the pride even of the haughty patrician families of Attica, and we now return to them as our legitimate theme. In our chapter on the system of trade unions farther on we give a detailed description of the ancient labor unions and evidences of their immense number which we have collected, partly by our own travel and observation, partly by personal interviews with the great authors of Archæological works and partly by ransacking with much patience and labor every written statement which original law and history, together with the criticism of modern and ancient authors thereon, have contributed to illumine this dark page of the social past.

The ancient trade union, both under the law of Solon and of Numa Pompilius, was a state institution! The land taken by conquest belonged to the state, together with the family religion and all its magnificent temples of worship. The great buildings of the cities were property of the state; most of the slaves who cultivated the soil under the direction, exclusively, of the trade union, were also property of the state. This made a social state—an almost socialistic state—and in many respects more social than political; but entirely spoiled by the terrible social distinctions of rank.⁷⁵ The religion, based upon heredity and superstition combined, was an extraordinary tissue of errors, greatly increasing the common misery of the people by flaunting in their faces the insult that none but the high-born citizen, eligible to the Eleusinian mysteries, could be sure of heaven. There could be no peace of mind while such a grievance existed; for it not only goaded the greater part of the people as an insult but distracted them with fears. It is a prominent characteristic of the Aryan race to believe in religion and build up institutions of a religious nature; and it will probably remain so unless some physical discovery be made throwing positive light against the theory of immortality. At the same time the Indo-Europeans were—precisely as they still are—an extremely democratic people by nature. A religion, then, based upon the most absurdly aristocratic dogmas could not, without great conflict maintain itself among the equality-loving Indo-Europeans. Jesus Christ during his visit among us established the remarkable idea that God was no respecter of persons; that all men were created equal; that although the elysion and tartaros or the heaven and hell were the same, the eligibility to gain the one and fly the other depended not upon stock, birth, fortune, but behavior. The revolution was then begun. When we understand from a standpoint of scientific sociology the phenomena of the past thus connected with the ancient struggles of the lowly, there bursts forth before our vision a glory of light sweeping away hitherto insurmountable difficulties to the analysis of certain vague and obscure points in history.

⁷⁵ Millar, Origin of Ranks, Basil. 1793, chap. vi.; Granier, Hist. des Classes Ouvrières, pp. 484-493. In his 18th chapter, Granier cites the rescript of Antoninus Pius: "Dominorum quidem potestatem in servos suos inlibitum esse oportet, nec cuiquam hominum jus suum detrahi." Ulpian, De Officio Proconsulis, lib. VIII; De Dominorum Severitia. This power of the masters over their slaves was thus later transferred to the state.

It is now, after having opened these facts thus far, in order to set down two theorems: The first is, that the greater the organization of the working classes for mutual protection and resistance the higher the standard of enlightenment in the communities they inhabit. In other words the intensity of enlightenment in civilization may be measured and compared by the numeric proportion of the laboring people arrayed in organized resistance against ignorance, and oppression. The second theorem may be construed to read that the higher the enlightenment, the more complete is the extinction of social ranks.

We are also now ready to make an announcement which no person can consistently deny; to wit: that the era covered by the ancient trade unions is that known, sung and celebrated as the "Golden Age." It is not only the era of military, but pre-eminently of social, and in Greece, of intellectual prosperity. The great literary era of the Romans occupies the latter half of the celebrated golden era. It lasted from the days of Numa Pompilius who encouraged the free organization of Roman trade unions which was about 690 years before Christ, until the year 58 B. C. when Cæsar ordered the conspiracy laws.⁷⁶ In Greece from the time of Solon about 592 years before Christ it continued down to her conquest by the Romans.

Thus the economical prosperity of both Greece and Rome is proved to have covered those centuries which were favored with the right of free organization. We shall now proceed to touch upon the actual deeds of these unions and show as we have the evidences that the superb architectural works whose august ruins still amaze the beholder were, to some extent at least, the handiwork of those trade unions, backed by that phenomenal, and to the present age, incomprehensible social state which never sold its lands, religion, jurisprudence or ornaments to others, nor allowed them to be overridden by monopolies. The labor of land culture—which produced and distributed among all people their food—of manufacturing arms and equipments for the armies, of provisioning the armies while on the march and at rest, of manufacturing and repairing the household furniture, of image-making, which appears to have been a considerable industry and of constructing architectural works, was largely assigned to the labor unions during the golden age.” Numa discouraged warfare, but made specific arrangements governing the artisan class;⁷⁷ and at the Saturnalia obliterated the lines of distinction between the nobles and the common born. He distributed the artisans into nine great mechanical fraternities. Flavius Josephus⁷⁸ gives an elaborate and highly interesting account of the building of the temple of Jerusalem by Solomon. Suffice it to say here, that the employer, Hiram, who was engaged by Solomon to come with his skill and skilled force all the way from Tyre a distance of about 100 miles, to design and construct this ⁷⁷ Granier, pp. 284–323, all through.

⁷⁶ Suetonius, Cæsar, 42: “Cæsar cuncta collegia præter antiquitus constituta distraxit.”

⁷⁸ Plutarch, Numa, cap. xvii.; also Lycurgus, and Numa Compared.

⁷⁹ Josephus, Antiquities of the Jews, book XII. cap. ii.; also Hist. of the Jews, book VIII.

magnificent edifice, was, so to speak, a boss or chief even a trade union, which through him, took one of the largest and most imposing contracts known in ancient or modern times; and it is a very interesting example of the intelligence and extraordinary enterprise of the Phoenicians. We are not among those eager creduli who jump at conclusions, and ready to suppose that this Hiram was the founder of the celebrated ancient fraternity of "Free Masons." On the contrary, the institution was old when Hiram brought to Solomon the 3,200 foremen and the 40,000 artificers who built this gorgeous temple of which Josephus so glowingly speaks. But this immense work being a religious undertaking, conducted by a political decree and under state control, and furthermore being a Semitic, not an Aryan enterprise and consequently free from the mean, rank exclusivism characterizing and belittling the source-history of all their great works, was able to rise and carry with it some lucid scintillae as to the manner of its erection. The great temple of Solomon furnished posterity a slight glimpse at the order of Free Masons; being a landmark merely observable in an obscure night of time. Its ruins may, therefore, be truthfully classed, by the student of sociology, as archaeological proof of the ancient trade union movement. By this, the mind of the general reader may better understand the source of that all-pervading cloud which so unfortunately shuts us off from the clues—to say nothing of the history—regarding the construction of one of the most magnificent works of sculptured masonry ever produced. The religio-political institutions, based on the antithetic origin of birth and its entailments of rank, prevented the workmen from rising into recognition, or transmitting beyond their own generation any detailed knowledge as to how those structures rose. The powerful archon Pericles, of Athens, furnished us an illustration of this. He wanted to build the Parthenon. Now Pericles, the statesman, building a church, shows that no difference existed between church and state, since belief was compulsory under law. The Parthenon was the grandest edifice of either the ancient or modern world.⁸⁰ Although Pericles was a noble, of the family of the Pisistratidæ, yet we know that he was the intimate friend of Phidias. So we are informed that Solomon enjoyed the acquaintance of Hiram. This might be, though Phidias and Hiram were both of mean extraction, according to the estimation of ranks. But their superiors admired them for their genius alone. A wonderful contrast projects from a coincidence of the late mediæval age, consisting in Raphael's intimacy with Pope Leo X., for at the time of Raphael, Christianity with its inexorable moral erosions had gnawed away much of the ancient ranks, and had begun to invite an absolute equality; whereas, in the more ancient times, under the dominion of the Pagan faith, it could not be more than admiration and acquaintance. In the same manner, Pericles, who was the master political genius of his age, could admire and keep an acquaintance with Aspasia, a lady of the lower rank, but he could not raise her by any gift of title to a higher one than that in which she was born.

⁸⁰ Guhl and Koner, Life of the Greeks and Romans, pp. 25-28.

It is almost certain that in the construction of the Parthenon, Ictinus was to Pericles what Hiram⁸¹ was to Solomon. Ictinus,⁸² we are told, was chief architect, and with the assistance of Callicrates and Phidias who worked on the chyselephantine statue of Athena, had charge, as chief architect, of the Parthenon. It appears⁸³ that Phidias took the entire control of all the building enterprises of Athens and also, probably of the temple of Eleusis; for Ictinus built the fane of this temple. We are now centering upon the interesting point of our investigation. It took Phidias, Ictinus and Callicrates ten years to design and complete the new Parthenon, the most magnificent and imposing structure of ancient or modern times. More fortunate are we in having Josephus and other authority for the temple of Solomon whereon not only the chief architect, but 3,200 foremen and 40,000 masons of the great "body" or masons' fraternity were engaged.⁸⁴

At the Piræus there existed, at the time of the building of the Parthenon, great numbers of trade unions,⁸⁵ under ⁸¹ Care should be taken not to confound Hiram the artificer with his friend Hiram the king. ⁸²Guhl and Koner, Idem, p. 25.

⁸³ Pausanias, Hellados Periegesis, (Description of Greece).

⁸⁴ Josephus, Antiquities of the Jews, book VII. chap. ii. In latin the "body" corpus, was a legalized workmen's society, the same as collegium. See Orelli, Inscr. Vol. III. Henzen, p. 170, of supplement index.

⁸⁵ See Chapter I. of Lüders Dionysische Künstler, pp. 14-18.

a provision of Solon engraved on wooden scrolls and kept in the Acropolis and the Prytaneum, which were legalized organizations and whose recognized business was to work for the state. Now with the multitudes of trade unions, existing all around, at Athens, at the Piræus, at Eleusis— is it supposable that the three directors built the parthenon in ten years? Instead of the 3,200 foremen and 40,000 men as at Jerusalem, there were probably at Athens 4,000 foremen and 50,000 masons, sculptors, draftsmen, hod carriers, laborers and others too numerous to detail. We find that this great public work was finished 438 years before Christ, just at the time when the golden age of labor was at its zenith of glory both in Greece and Rome.

It was the golden age of art and economic thrift. It also corresponds exactly with the stretch of time during which the trade unions under the laws of Solon at Athens and of Numa at Rome were in fullest force, granting and encouraging organization of the working people, which was used by them for protection and for resistance to all dangers that might beset them.

It is thus shown that while a serious grievance existed among the working people of ancient Greece, in form of an exclusivism denying them the right to save their souls by becoming members on equal footing in the Eleusinian order, there also existed a vast organization or confraternity which, then as now, afforded them opportunities for meeting in secret and discussing this grievance. It is scarcely necessary even to conjecture whether they did or did not use these advantages for such discussion. Human nature is alike in all ages. When the conspiracy law, or law of Elizabeth, was annulled in 1824,⁸⁸ permitting the people to organize in England, they immediately took advantage of every opportunity trade unionism afforded, wherewith to discuss their grievances. The growth and intelligence of the ponderous labor movement in the United States is largely due to the discussion which is constantly taking place in their secret unions. We venture that the same thing occurred in the times we are describing; because it could not well have been otherwise. Where the grievance exists and the opportunity to meet and discuss it exists, it is not in the order of nature among intelligent beings, to resist it. We are fortunate enough to have found statements upon the subjects of trade unions transmitted to us through great authority. Gaius, who wrote a digest of law on the Twelve Tables, has a passage which has been preserved and so important is it that both Granier and Mommsen refer to it as conclusive evidence that the law of the Twelve Tables providing for the right among working people to organize and enjoy trade unions, was to some extent a translation from Greek tables of the code of Solon.⁸⁷ In this passage are mentioned many organizations taken from the Greek text inscribed on the scroll of the law of Solon and also on the tablet of the Twelve Tables. The Thiasotai then were precisely in Greek what the Collegia were in Latin. The sailors' unions here mentioned were the same which we speak of elsewhere as existing in large numbers at the Piræus or seaport of Athens which was distant from the metropolis only five miles. The organizations of the stone masons, the marble cutters, the carvers, the image makers of wood mineral and ivory, and others, were located within the city. Some of these unions, probably the image makers, pretended more religious piety than others; but the fact is,⁸⁸ that all of them were combined for mutual aid and resistance against grievances. Under the law, so long as they did not corrupt the statutes of the country ("dum ne quid ex publica lege corrumpant,") they were not only allowed to career unmolested but were even protected by this provision of the great lawgivers.

⁸⁸Thorold Rogers, Six Centuries of Work and Wages, p. 438. As to the nature of the act of Elizabeth, see idem, pp. 398-9. Cf. Porter's Progress of the Nation.

This brings us face to face with two proven facts: that during the renowned era of Grecian architecture, belles-lettres, philosophy, sculpture, paintings—all work of laborers—there also flourished a great labor movement; just as now in England, in Germany, in France, in the United States and Canada, during the most brilliant period of all human enlightenment, ancient or modern, there flourishes an enormous social organization for self-help and for resistance against grievance endured by working people. It also proves the correctness of our theorems that the greater the organization of the laboring people against grievances the higher the enlightenment, and the higher the enlightenment the more complete the extinction of social rank; consequently the intensity of human civilization viewed on the largest scale, is, under the competitive system, to be ascertained by the prevalence or non-prevalence of these organizations, acting as mutually self-aiding forces and as tribunals or courts of appeal from the grievances their members are liable to suffer. How inefable, then, the arrogance of a paltry few! What must have been the character of resistance during the times of which we speak? Evidently very crude. At the present day there is much system; a general interlinking of union with union, no matter how wide apart, for a quite clearly expressed common cause. Not so anciently, although we have an inscription at Pompeii to prove that in B. C. 79 there existed an international union. Their grievances were greater than now, because social equality was contemptuously and most openly put down. The law recognized them as having no more claim to citizenship than dogs. Now, in Germany, France, almost everywhere, the working people are voting.

⁸⁷ Digest, lib. XLVII. tit. xxii. leg. 4: "Sodales sunt qui ejusdem collegii sunt quam Græci εταίριαν vocant." Again: "Sodalibus," ait Gaius, "potestatem facit lex (duodecim Tabularum) pactionem quam velint sibi ferre, dum ne quid ex publica lege corrumpant." Sed hæc lex videtur ex lege Solonis translata esse; nam illuc ita est: "Εἰ δὲ δῆμος, ἡ φράτρες, ἡ ἱερῶν ὀργίων, ἡ ναῦται, σύνσιτοι, ἡ ὁμόταφοι, ἡ διασῶται, ἡ ἐπὶ λίαν οἰχόμενοι, ἡ εἰς ἐμπορίαν. Ὅτι ταύτων διαδῶνται πρὸς ἀλλήλους, κύριον εἶναι, εἰ μὴ ἀπαγορεύσῃ δημόσια γράμματα." Both Mommsen (De Collegiis et Sodalibus Romanorum, p. 35,) and Granier, Hist. des Classes Ouvrières, p. 291, quote this remarkable passage from the Digest. The unions here mentioned in the Solonic law are the Brotherhood the Priests of the Communes, the Sailors, the Co-operators, the Burial Fraternities; and the regular trade unions or διασῶται such as were organized in the categories of Numa

⁸⁸ Mommsen, De Collegiis et Sodalibus Romanorum, p. 35, "Ut igitur de interpretatione verbi a XII. Tabulis adhibiti non constet, Gaii verba ad omnia collegia pertinere certum est neque ulla ratio reddi videtur posse, cur collegia optificum legum ferendarum jure caruerint sacris sodalitatibus concessio." See also Lüders, Die Dionsysischen Künstler, passim. These points are overwhelming in proof that the Greek and Roman trade union systems were nearly identical.

Whoever, in reading the "Ancient Assemblies,"²⁰ for a moment imagines that those celebrated gatherings included the slaves or freedmen, should read more carefully. It is the freemen who are meant, not freedmen. The difference was simply infinite, even in enlightened Attica; for freedmen were descendants of the ancient slaves. They never were citizens, could not vote, could not hope, except in cases of great genius like that of Phidias, to be decently ²⁰Schömann, Hist. Assemblies of the Athenians, passim. This book will clear up any error readers may entertain who doubts whether the working class was allowed a voice in legislation.

spoken to; and even as such they were obliged to obtain some special decree from the Areopagus in order to detach themselves from this scathing odium of rank. Being so mean, so lowly, while the patricians, the grandees, the free-men were descendants of the nobility in the direct lineage of the gods, it followed that the gods also contemned them. Consequently two-thirds of the population of Greece were without a soul. If they claimed to have souls they knew that the only place for them was Tartarus or hell; certainly not heaven; for that was the abode of the gods who spurned them on account of their lowly birth. Better cultivate the belief that they had no souls at all! This to them, terrible reflection, was probably the origin of the ancient philosophy of annihilation.⁹⁰ The philosophy of extinction of the soul must have consumed a share of the discussions of those ancient mechanics in their secret meetings. They built the magnificent temples which glowed with genial warmth of the solemn and haughty religion, only for the heaven-born, repelling with sullen frowns the earth-born designers and finishers of their colonnades, vaults and sculptured images. No merely political institution could possibly separate so widely one class from another as did that arrogant religion which not only instituted slavery of the laboring people but denied them an immortal soul and the beatitudes of heaven.⁹¹ There is now no grievance of this kind in civilized existence—although economical and social dissatisfaction remains. The new religion is rapidly extinguishing the dogma of distinctions in birth, as well as the dogma that “the earth-born have no immortal existence.”⁹²

Narrowing the array of evidence into our legitimate field, we find in Eleusis a target at which millions are peering with a mingling of longing, of envy and of hate. They are the two-thirds of the population of the country—the laboring ranks. There, upon a lovely range of rock and lawn stands the old Pelasgian city of Eleusis, populous and thick-studded with their own eranoi and thiasoi, labor unions whose members are the strong-muscled men of Greece. It is the eve of autumn, the great quinquennial Boedromion which from traditions brought mystic meanings picturing the fierce amazons in flight before the conquering giants of Theseus. It is the last half of shimmering September whose delicious zephyrs float the gossamers above the sea.

⁹⁰ Consult Lucretius, De Rerum Natura; also Arnobius, who wrote the famous Adversus Gentes. Arnobius was not fully convinced of Christianity; and at the same time his mind was evidently so enlarged by it that he could not reconcile it with the older Pagan belief in the nether post-mortem abodes. He was however, religiously inclined and was reluctantly drawn to Christianity which obliterated all lines by declaring the equality of all mankind. Between these awful doubts Arnobius seems never to have come to a belief in an immortal existence. Pliny the celebrated naturalist was a believer in the doctrine of Lucretius that there is no existence hereafter. Cf. Cuvier in Bibliog. Universelle.

⁹¹ Granier, Hist. Whole argument; Fustel de Coulanges, Cité Antique. No intelligent person can read these invaluable works without understanding our meaning.

⁹² Whatever science may or may not develop regarding these debatable theories is not the part of this disquisition to consider. We simply give the facts at command, as to the difference between the grievances discussed by the organizations of then and now.

All the world knows that on the morrow thousands upon thousands of people are to leave the Athenian metropolis behind them and commence their crusade to the Eleusinian feast. They are the eligibles, the citizens, the freemen. Not a being from among the laboring and lowly class can be permitted hardly to join the great procession. Fond of privilege but barred its enjoyment they gather in their best rags, upon the scene and form in a standing multitude along the line of march. No care has ever been bestowed upon their education and they are in consequence, rough, perhaps boisterous and insulting. As the procession moves along they pelt the crusaders with sticks and stones.⁹³ They feel the deep disgrace of their exclusion and are animated with unhappy feelings and hatred and revenge. They turn their eyes toward the magnificent temple of Megaron, built⁹⁴ by their own hands, of marble quarried from the rock near by.⁹⁵ It is pre-eminently the most majestic work of their handicraft, standing solemn and alone like a mysterious winged creature, striking awe by its very presence and as though a ghostly apparition which had surged from the dark pits of the sea.⁹⁶ To the left loomed up a view of ⁹³ When, as the fable goes, Ceres left king Celeus and went to the old temple, Iambe, her female slave, ridiculed her. Ever afterwards at the αγυρμος or day of march at the crusades, the lower or excluded classes met on the wayside with stones, clubs and ridicule.

⁹⁴ Consult Rose, Inscriptiones Græcæ Vetustissimæ, pp. 187-190.

⁹⁵ Idem, p. 187, note; "E duro quodam marmoris genere (quale prope Eleusiniem invenitur.)" Likewise the description of the great temple, by Guhl and Koner, Life of the Greeks and Romans, pp. 47-49.

⁹⁶ "Prope oleam erat puteus aquæ salis (θάλασσα Ερεχθίδης) quam sub flatum noti surdo murmure fluctuum instar strepero, narrabant Athenienses. Ipse scilicet Neptunus hanc voraginem aperuerat tridente, ejus adhuc vestigium in saxo vivo expressum restabat. De fonte salso noli dubitare. Nam et alius in arce fons aquæ amaræ qui etesiarum flatu—sub ortum caniculæ—impleri, postea considerare solebat, Clepsydra dictus." Ister. Ap. Schol. Aristophanis, Av. 1693, p. 63. Though this superstition may have been based at the acropolis, it is evident that the horrors of it came from old Eleusis: besides Erechtheis was the priestess in charge of the Eleusinian initiations.

the noble pronaos whose fluted columns towered high, holding their graceful architraves, and culminating in those exquisite Corinthian capitals of the pilasters, celebrated throughout the world for the beauty and richness of their carvings. Their own Ictinus, guiding their own, or their ancestors' toil had built the huge, but forbidding telesterium and conclave where those mysterious initiations and degrees were conferred; not upon them, but upon those born worthy of the honor. Their own Xenocles was the master mason who had led them through a labyrinth of toil which produced the lordly, throne-like anactoron where dwelt the immortal Ceres. Their own master sculptor, Metagenes had directed their skillful hands through the mazes of sculpture which produced those soft and charming friezes, and reared the upper columns on which rest the vast entablatures with their architraves and frettings. Led by such masters who have come down to fame as the genius of classic architecture, wage-earners had delved for more than a decade of years to fashion the home of the Mystagogoi, those favored priests who repulsed them with bitterest scorn and all others who could not bring proof that for three generations at least, they had never disgraced themselves by the social blight of labor. These were the thanks the ancient lowly received for building those enduring and exquisite monuments of art.

No wonder then, that as the procession moved down from the acropolis to the sea, the outcasts, uncultured, unrefined, enslaved, treated the haughty initiates with brickbats and jeers. There were quarrels about this grievance; but so dark has the historian been upon the subject that we are unable to obtain further positive data than these we quote. But what we do know sheds light upon the causes of a great change which in course of time came into the world; a change that planted the seed of revolution. It was a religio-political state based upon legalized pretensions, and assumed absolute rights of less than one-third of the entire population of the Indo-European world and the absolute non-recognition and social, political and hierarchical ostracism of the other two-thirds of the population on whose labor they depended for their food, clothing, shelter and worship.

A word more may suffice to close this chapter. Our object in saying so much has been to exhibit the double grievance suffered by the religious as well as the social and economic tyranny of ancient society over the laboring people. From the time labor organizations began, until the era of the sophists, no one can tell the ages that elapsed. The sophists and philosophers began their work in Greece five centuries before Christ. They were revolutionists so far as they dared go. The general movement of Plato and Aristotle must though conflicting, certainly be regarded as one of the most remarkable of the world. It worked enormously in the direction of preparing mankind for the revolution—the change from a condition of slavery of the useful laboring masses to one of complete social, political and spiritual recognition and equality. Plato was a slave owner. He was so proud that he disdained to accept money for his services as a teacher, preferring to accept presents from the wealthy young students under his charge—the reverse of what in our own times is considered proper. Had Plato thus lived and acted just before our modern war of the rebellion he would have been called a slave-driving hypocrite by abolitionists at the North, and a canting moralist by the people at the South. He was of neither party. Even the workingmen of his own times hated him. What he did was probably equilibrated both between sympathy and diplomacy, largely tempered by sympathy and conscience and on the whole, working all the radical good which the times would permit. The world is better for this celebrated advocate of slavery having lived; for on the whole, though he could not see any way possible of expunging this horrid social ulcer of slavery from his republic, his sympathy got the better of acquisitiveness and like all the teachers of that era, he melted the brutal spirit which in Sparta instigated such inhuman cruelties toward the laboring class. All over Attica they were treated with comparative tenderness and consideration and though they suffered the grievances we have described, yet they shared the age of philosophy and art as an age peculiarly their own in organization and plenty. It was their Golden age of equality. We do not mean exact equality or similarity in the physical and intellectual sense; for nothing could be more absurd. We mean by it the extinction of those aristocratic lines which pride, egoism and greed had so long held as a basis of religion and of state.

CHAPTER V.

STRIKES AND UPRISINGS.

GRIEVANCES CONTINUED. PLANS OF ESCAPE.

FIRST KNOWN and First Tried Plan of Salvation was that of Retaliation—The Slaves test the Ordeal of Armed Force—Iracibility of the Working Classes at length arrayed against their Masters—Typical Strikes of the ancient Workingmen—Their Inhuman Treatment—Famous Strike at the Silver Diggings of Laurium—20,000 Artisans and Laborers quit Work in a Body and go over to the Foes of their own Countrymen—The Great Peloponnesian War Decided for the Spartans, against the Athenians by this Fatal Strike.

IN ancient Greece, Sicily and Rome there occurred great and disastrous strikes. The character of the elements causing these disturbances varied greatly from that of the modern strikers. Quite the reverse of our modern, the ancient strikers were either slaves or freedmen descended from such, and in a condition of extreme lowliness but often so intelligent that notwithstanding the odds against them they sometimes out-generated their masters and obtained for a long period of time, even years, against wealth, priesthood and military force. The reasons for this we have already explained but may appropriately repeat. The slaves and freedmen were mostly men of their masters' own blood. They were of the same race, color and natural intelligence. They used the same languages, were accustomed to the same roads and fields, knew the cliffs, grottoes, forests and jungles; and there being no firearms or other instruments of destruction which in our modern warfare throw the balance of power into the hands of the most disciplined rather than the most numerous, they sometimes triumphed for a time by dint of numbers.

During the Peloponnesian war a great strike of the working people occurred in and about the silver mines of Laurium,¹ B. C. 413. It may be well here to enumerate some of the grievances inciting them to this desperate resolve which they knew perfectly well beforehand, would, unless they succeeded, terminate in their death by tortures of the most inhuman artifices the maddened cruelty of greedy money-getters could invent. Nearly all the slaves and other working people, laborers and artificers engaged in this enormous strike, were intelligent people. Some were persons who were slaves by the misfortune of birth;² others were prisoners of war reduced by violence to slavery. Still others were slaves as merchandise brought to the mines by the vicissitudes of traffic; and lastly and worst, there were large numbers who were convicts, condemned to work in the mines under the lash of brutal hireling overseers of contractors³ who worked these mines on leases from the government to which they paid one twentieth of the proceeds. It was a great grievance to the intelligent workmen to be goaded by the knowledge that he was a social monstrosity.⁴ Men now recoil at the sight of a slave because he is the rare relic of an institution which human wisdom and sympathy have outstripped, outlived, outgrown in the glori-

¹ Thucydides De Bello Peloponensiaco, VII. 27: "Ἀμείκοντο δὲ καὶ Θρακῶν τῶν μαχαιροφόρων τοῦ Διακοῦ γένους ἐς τὰς Ἀθήνας πέλτασται ἐν τῷ αὐτῷ θέρει τούτῳ τριακόσιοι καὶ χίλιοι, οἷς εἶδει τῷ Δημοσθένει ἐς τὴν Σικελίαν ἐμπλεῖν. οἱ δ' Ἀθηναῖοι, ὡς ὕστερον ἦκον, διανοοῦντο αὐτοὺς πάλιν ὅθεν ἦλθον ἐς Θράκην ἀποπέμπειν. τῷ γὰρ ἔχειν πρὸς τὸν ἐκ τῆς Δακελίας πόλεμον αὐτοὺς πολυτελεῖς ἐφαίνετο· δραχμὴν γὰρ τῆς ἡμέρας ἕκαστος ἐλάμβανεν. ἐπειδὴ γὰρ ἡ Δακέλεια τὸ μὲν πρῶτον ὑπὸ πάσης τῆς στρατίας ἐν τῷ θέρει τούτῳ τειχισθεῖσα, ὕστερον δὲ φρουραῖς ἀπὸ τῶν πέλων κατὰ διαδοχὴν χρόνου ἐπιούσαις τῇ χώρῃ ἐπεκείτο, πολλὰ ἐβλάπτετο τοὺς Ἀθηναίους καὶ ἐν τοῖς πρώτοις χρημάτων τ' ὀλέθρῳ καὶ ἀνθρώπων ψυχρᾷ ἐκάκωσε τὰ πράγματα. πρότερον μὲν γὰρ βραχεῖαι γιγνόμεναι αἱ ἐσβολαὶ τὸν ἄλλον χρόνον τῆς γῆς ἀπολαύειν οὐκ ἐκώλυον· τότε δὲ συνεχῶν ἐγκαθημένων, καὶ ὅτε μὲν κας πλεόνων ἐπιόντων, ὅτε δ' ἐξ ἀνάγκης τῆς ἰσῆς φρουρᾶς καταθεοῦσης τε τὴν χώραν καὶ ληστείας ποιουμένης, βασιλέως τὴν παρότος τοῦ τῶν Δακεδαιμονίων Ἀγιδος, ὅς οὐκ ἐκ παρέγου τὸν πόλεμον ἐποιεῖτο, μεγάλα οἱ Ἀθηναῖοι ἐβλάπτοντο· τῆς τε γὰρ χώρας ἀπάσης ἐστέρηντο καὶ ἀνδραπόδων πλέον ἢ δύο μυριάδες ἡτομολήκεσαν, καρτῶν τε καὶ πολλὸν μέρος χειροτέχναι, πρόβατά τε πάντα ἀπολώλει καὶ ὑποζύγια· ἵπποι τε, ὅσημέραι ἐξελαυνόντων τῶν ἱππέων πρὸς τε τὴν Δακέλειαν καταδρομὰς ποιουμένων καὶ κατὰ τὴν χώραν φυλασσόντων, οἱ μὲν ἀπεχολοῦντο ἐν γῇ ἀποκρότῃ τε καθυπερχῶς ταλαιπωροῦντες, οἱ δ' ἐτιτρώσκοντο.

Xenophon, De Vectigal. IV. 25.

² Granier de Cassagnac, Histoire des Classes Ouvrières, chap. iii.

³ Plutarch, Nicias and Crassus Compared, 1.

⁴ Drumann, Arbeiter und Communisten in Griechenland und Rom, S. 24;

Blackh, Public Economics of the Athenians, p. 263, for instances of men own-treat numbers of slaves; See also Böckh's Laurische Silberbergwerke in Atticism.

ous race of enlightenment. Even at that ear'y age the slave's servitude was the source of his own intelligent disgust; for covered as he was with the indelible brands and scars of systematic mutilation, and decrepit in premature age through blows and strains of violence and overwork, his mind remained unimpaired, often edged to consciousness of its own incompatibility with this state of degradation. The poor creatures were never allowed to eat white bread.⁸ There were no Sundays for them. Of the 365 days they were forced to delve 360. Sometimes the government owned them and subbed them with the mines themselves to the contractors, following the plan of Xenophon,⁹ who sometimes thus worked great numbers at a time. Often, however, the rich contractor himself owned laboring men with whom to operate the mines. Thus Nicias owned a thousand slaves,¹⁰ Mnason also owned a thousand.¹¹ The ancients appear to have had a species of passion for seeing acts of brutality and cruelty.

Wakes are of great antiquity. Originally they were public fights on the occasion of the death of an important member of a gens family, in which the combatants were his slaves so unfortunate as to have survived him. All the family, its slaves and their children, perhaps also the community not allied by blood, were summoned to see what in our refined age would not only be repellent cruelties, but intolerable ones—a fight to the death, of slaves of the deceased, with daggers and clubs.¹² The first combat on record of this kind occurred in B. C. 264, arranged by the brothers Brutus.¹³ But authors agree that the practice comes from much more remote antiquity; and mention of it is made here to prepare the reader to understand some of the causes

⁸ Granier, de Cass. Hist. Ouvriers, p. 98, who gives references.

⁹ Bücher Aufstände der unfreien Arbeiter, S. 96; Xenoph. Memorab. III. 6, 12. For 360 days in the year those poor working people male and female, had to drudge. Xenophon, 4, 16; Böckh, Silberbergwerke, S. 125.

¹⁰ Xenophon, De Vectigal. cap. iv.

¹¹ Bücher, Aufstände, etc. S. 96; Drumann Arbeiter und Communisten, II. 11-23.

¹² Böckh, Public Economics of the Athenians, p. 268. The celebrated plan of Xenophon for replenishing the Athenian treasury (De Vectigal. cap. iv.) was to have the state put 60,000 of its own slaves on the state silver mines of Laurium, to be leased to contractors. He even gives figures on the presumable income from this plan of relief to the state.

¹³ Friedländer, Darstellungen aus der Sittengeschichte Roms, II. 216.

¹⁴ Guhl and Koner, Life of the Greeks and Romans. We give references to modern authors so that readers not conversant with the original languages may get them and satisfy themselves.

lurking at the bottom of the evil of ancient strikes and uprisings. Gibbon relates the horrible story of the Syracusan, L. Domitius.¹² One of the poor, innocent slaves during his prætorship, one day while assisting in the chase, killed a wild boar of enormous size and very dangerous. The daring deed got noised about until it reached the ear of Domitius who ordered the slave to be brought to him as he desired to see so brave a man. The poor creature appeared before this fellow, humbly expecting a trifle of praise so seldom the lot of the Syracusan slave. To his horror, however, this monster's first question was, what kind of weapon or means were employed by him in performing the deed. The answer was a javelin. "Are you not aware that the javelin is a weapon for gentlemen; and that for so mean a creature as a slave to use the weapons of men, is death?" Turning to his soldiers he said, "take this slave away and crucify him." The trembling wretch was actually crucified upon the spot. The heart sickens at the contemplation of our descent from such a type of monsters!

Bücher notes¹³ that single contractors often worked 300 to 600 slaves in the silver mines of Laurium and that convicts who were government property were sometimes sold to the contractors who exploited their labor in their own name.¹⁴ Sometimes intelligent men in those days were half slaves and half free, being enfeoffed by livery of seizin, no doubt, if unambitious of freedom, enjoying thereby some advantages over those entirely out in the competitive world. Such men were paid a per diem, varying from 3 to 7 oboli, or from 10 to 19 cents for their labor.¹⁵

Callias the friend of Cimon, B. C. 460, became wealthy, managing mines. All or nearly all the mines were, with the ancients, the property of the state. The state contracted the working of the mines to enterprising business men who often hired slaves to do the work. These contractors were often men of noble blood. The sense of the social structure being against conducting or managing one's own business.

¹² Gibbon, Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, Vol. I. p. 48. N. Y., 1850: Böckh, Silberbergwerke, S. 122-3, adds testimony to this hardheartedness of the ancients, referring to Plato who, for his perfect state, wanted only Greeks exempt from slavery.

¹³ Anfänge etc., S. 96.

¹⁴ Böckh, Abhandlung der Historisch-Philologischen Classe der Preussischen Akademie der Wissenschaften, 1814-15.

¹⁵ El. Public Econ. of Athenians, p. 164.

Only the slaves and other workmen, those who actually performed the work, were doomed to suffer the odium of labor. Any business man who could get a bond, could take from the state a portion or the whole of a mine; and sometimes even the slaves themselves were to be had of the state. In this case, the complete outfit was contracted for by the individual, who had no further care than to manipulate products and gains. Callias and Cimon had either contracts for or ownership in the mines of silver at Laurium, located to the southeastward of Athens about 30 miles.¹⁶ Their names appear also, but vaguely in connection with the Pangæus mines in Thrace. It is known that Thucydides the celebrated historian owned mining property in Macedonia. He was a rich slave owner and optimate. One Sosias a Thracian contractor hired from Nicias a thousand slaves, at an obolus per day each.¹⁷ Hyponicus rented or hired as many as 600 slaves to these contractors and received, as Xenophon tells us, a mina daily for their labor. Philemonides for 300 slaves got half a mina.¹⁸

Public servants were not always free. Wages in the time of Pericles stood about as follows:¹⁹ for a common laborer who carried dirt, 3 oboli,²⁰ or 10½ cents per day. A gardener got 14 cents; a sawyer of wood, one drachm, or 19 cents; a carpenter received sometimes as high as 17½ cents while millers in the grain mills received 15 to 18 cents. Scribes or copyists no more. The architect of the temple of Minerva got no more than the stone sawyer and others only as much as the common laborer. His name was Polias. Boeckh says he received one drachm or exactly 17½ cents. The hypogrammateus or secretary to the superintendent of public buildings got only 5 oboli or about 15 cents.

The fares for traveling conveyances were also very low. In fact, the clerks and public officials of every kind were government subjects who received low salaries and worked long hours. Their life was a constant drudgery. The superintendents themselves were officers of family or blood. They were citizens; but the dignity of their position restrained them from receiving any recompense.

¹⁶ Plutarch, Cimon. Cornelius Nepos, Cimon; "non tam generosus quam pecuniosus, qui magnas pecunias ex metallis fecerat."

¹⁷ Xenophon, De Vectigal. §. 4, 14; Plutarch, Nicias, 4.

¹⁸ Xenophon, Id. 1, c. § 15.

¹⁹ Boeckh, Pub. Econ. Athen. p. 164.

²⁰ An obolus was 8½ cts, a drachma 19.

Thus in Greece, Rome and everywhere throughout antiquity, such were the oppressive conditions that the intelligent among the working classes, goaded by their sufferings, were on the alert, sometimes for revenge, sometimes for objects of amelioration, but oftener from sheer, reckless despair, and ready to strike out in bloody rebellion against their master.

With this statement on general causes of strikes we proceed with the story of the greatest of all, belonging purely to this category of human resistance, to be found either in ancient or modern times.²¹ It may be plausibly conjectured that this great strike in turning the tables against the Athenians and thus deciding the celebrated Peloponnesian war against them and the little democracy that had grown up in the Athenian civilization and refinement, went far toward suppressing the true progress of the human race.²²

The silver mines of Laurium, 30 miles south from the city of Athens, were among the resources of Athenian wealth. They belonged to the government. The methods of obtaining the precious metal was by arduous labor, without much of the modern machinery. Diodorus describing the Egyptian mines between Coptos and Cosseir, pictures the sufferings of the poor convicts and barbarians working there;²³ and Bücher says that was also the case with those working the Laurian mines.²⁴ According to this, men and women in great numbers who had committed some crime against the state or otherwise, were dragged into the subterranean cavern, stripped entirely of their clothing, their bodies painted, their legs loaded with chains and in this frightful condition, set at work drilling the rock, breaking it in pieces and carrying it to the mouth of the shaft. Outside the mine were smitheries, machine shops for making stamping mills, water tanks and courses for washing the metal, wagon shops for making and repairing vehicles of conveyance and other conveniences necessary for so great an industry, employing great numbers of slaves and freedmen for carrying on the works.

²¹ The greater uprisings are known, not as strikes but as servile wars; although we sometime confound them with strikes.

²² Drumann, Arbeiter und Communisten in Griechenland und Rom, S. 64.

²³ Diodorus Bibliotheca Historica, V. 38.

²⁴ Bücher, Aufstände der unfreien Arb. S. 96.

²⁵ Compare Plutarch, Nicias and Crassus Comp. Init. Plutarch here avers that the workmen under Nicias were often mafactors and convicts.

These mines of Laurium were in operation when the Peloponnesian war broke out, B. C. 432, between the Spartans and Athenians, which lasted 27 years. Thucydides speaks as though the offer held out to the workmen employed as slaves by the Athenians, of 18 cents per day uniformly, was a very tempting one.²⁶ They were poor dependents, some slaves, some freedmen, some convicts, subjected to abuse, thrown pel-mel together, driven to hard work, poorly fed, those within the mines, naked and suffering, and utterly destitute of that feeling known to us as patriotism, although many of them were Athenians.²⁷ During this obstinate struggle the Lacedæmonian forces, B. C. 418, approached as near to Athens as Decelea, a garrisoned frontier town in Boetia held by them, where they established themselves over against the Athenian lines. The distance between Decelea on the borders of Boetia and Athens is only about 20 miles. The Athenian ergasteria or workshops were manned in part by slaves.²⁸ So, whether in the shops and arsenals at Athens, or in the silver mines of Laurium, both of which, during war time, were indispensable for supplying money and arms, the sinews of production were not quickened by that peculiarly inspiring urgent known to us as patriotism. Labor hated alike home, fatherland and employer. When war broke out the laborer, instead of turning his power and genius to swift production of engines for hurling missiles of destruction among the invaders of his country, sought in the vortex of fierce disturbance, some festive of retreat from the monstrous cruelties of bondage.

Thus in this pivotal contest between the Spartans and Athenians, compared with the Spartans' treatment of the Helots or Lacedæmonian slaves, the Athenians with all the horrors that have been pictured, were mild, we find the grievance intensified beyond endurance. Compared with Spartan suavity, philosophy and moral advancement, the Athenians were as civilization to barbarism; for Sparta had never questioned the claims of Pagan aristocracy and Lycurgus had built upon it in all its austere presumptiveness a ring or community of about one-third the population and damned the remaining two-thirds to a stage of slavery very little better than that of naked convicts described by Diodorus in the gold mines of Egypt.²⁰ Yet notwithstanding the brutal example the poor slaves had just witnessed, of Spartan treachery, in assassinating 2,000 brave helots a few years before,²¹ some knowledge of which they must certainly have possessed²² we find the poor Athenian workmen readily accepting an offer by the Spartans and joining them in great numbers against their own fatherland.

²⁶ Thucydides. De Bello Peloponnesiaco, VII. 27, already quoted. p. 107.

²⁷ Bücher. Aufstände d. unfreien Arb. S. 21.

²⁸ Drumann; Arb. u. Communisten in Griechenland u. Rom, S. 64; "Auch in den Fabriken, εργαστήρια, sah man nur Sklaven."

Undoubtedly this was a very dangerous exploit of the strikers and could not have succeeded without some organization. But we are left in the dark regarding most of the details. No doubt the near approach of the Lacedæmonian forces and the demoralization of the Athenians as well as their ingratitude, together with the arrogance of Cimon and the revenges of Alcibiades, might have had much to do with it.

This great strike must have been plotted by the men themselves. We are, through the two or three brief references to it, given us by the historians,²³ left to infer that it must have been well concerted, violent and swift. The inference is unequivocal that in 413, B. C. 20,000 miners, mechanics, teamsters and laborers suddenly struck work; and at a moment of Athens' greatest peril, fought themselves loose from their masters and their chains. These 20,000 workmen made a desperate bolt for the Spartan garrison newly established at Decelea on the borders of Bœtia. The strike must have been the more desperate on account of the offers held out to them by the enemy. One of the offers was that they should be provided with work which they should perform on their own reckoning; but that they should pay only a part of it to their masters or employers. At this lav. by industry and patience they could not only buy themselves free. Unaccustomed to plenty and suddenly thus provided with enough to eat and drink, they naturally gave themselves up to indulgence to some extent for Dr. Drumann tells us that many of the slaves lived better than the freedmen themselves, though we have no account of their dissipating.³⁴ The statement of Dr. Bücher, that this strike of the workmen of Athens was a heavy blow to the mining operations of the Laurian silver diggings, confirms the importance of this immense uprising in Attica. The sudden loss of 20,000 workmen, inured to the hardships of mining life, and drilled to the mechanical niceties of the assays for the money supply, of the wagon works, and of the armories at Athens where most of the sabers, slings, daggers, javelins, campaign wagons and other impedimenta of war were constructed, is known to have been a serious set-back to the progress of the Peloponnesian conflict. But while it disheartened the Athenians it proportionately encouraged and delighted the Lacedæmonians; and as the latter were not of the party of progress but engaged in invidious activity against the Athenians, at that time the most democratic and advanced people in the world, it acted directly against the evolution of mankind. No one pretends to deny that the Spartans, boasting of the hegemony of their youth and their consequent warlike prowess, were mad with jealousy against the wondrous work of Athenian philosophy, letters, fine art and polish;—the very adornments, theoretical and mechanical, which have in course of subsequent ages succeeded in ridding the world of slavery. Yet we find in this great strike 20,000 workingmen revolting and turning their muscle against their own comparatively progressive institutions, thus doing all in their power to aid the Spartans in subduing this growing Athenian intelligence. Of course we cannot blame them for resistance; for it raised them, although it doomed their cause. The brilliant Athenians were, after a struggle of 27 years, defeated and the Spartans succeeded in re-establishing the old, jealous, conservative paganism—that deadliest enemy of freedom, the nursery of slavery, the home of priestcraft and of aristocracy, ever inculcating belief in divine right of few against many.

²⁰ Hist. III. 11, V 88

²¹ 80, massacre of the Helots, B. C. 424, et sup., p. 106, sq. note undercurrent of the ephron during the great uprisings, Athenion and Spartacus; and the same was anti-slavery rebellion in the United States, with same information.

²² Belle Pét. VI. 91, VIII. 4, VII. 27; Xenophon, De mann. Arb. u. Comm. S. 64; Bücher, Aufst. d. ar. "Im Jahre vor Chr. 413 schlugen sich 20,000 Athen. d. den Lakedaimoniern, ein schwerer Schlag für den Böeth, Laurische Silberbergwerke, S. 90-1, also men-

³⁴ Drumann, Arbeiter und Communisten in Griechenland und Rom, S. 64. "Der grösste Theil der 20,000, welche im peloponnesischen Kriege in Attica zu der spartanischen Besatzung in Decelia entliefen, kam aus Fabriken. Mitunter wurde ihnen gestattet, für eigene Rechnung zu arbeiten, und ein Gewisses theil an ihre Herren abzugeben; so konnten fleissige und sparsame eine Summe erübrigen und sich loskaufen; manche machten mehr Aufwand als die Freien." Bücher says, S. 21: "Wo viele Sklaven derselben Nationalität in einer Stadt zusammen lebten, sagt Platon, (legg. VI. p. 777), geschähe grosses Unheil, was doch nur auf wirkliche Aufstände mit all ihren Gräueln zu deuten ist." So also at Rome the feeling was against the poorest class and aggravated by a fear of their mutinies. Cato the elder was a hard-hearted slave-driver as Livy, (XXXIX. 40), coolly hints, without seeming to imagine that brutal treatment of a menial was inhumanity. Macrobius, (Saturnaliorum Libri, I, xi. 2, 25-30,) says that in Rome so great was the cruelty of citizens to the laboring class that God himself protested: "Audi igitur quanta indignatio de serui supplicio caelum penetraverit. anno enim post Romam conditam quadringentesimo septuagesimo quarto Autranus quidam Maximus seruum suum ueberatū patibuloque constrictum ante spectaculi commissionem per circum egit: ob quam causam indignatus Iuppiter Annio cuidam per quietem imperavit ut senatui nuntiaret non sibi placuisse plenum crudelitatis admissum." Thus cruelty with other grievances caused them to revolt. Of course, those who were already free were still more fortunate. It is curious that the law was such that the slaves remained slaves even after winning the strike.

Not far from Decilea on the Athenian seacoast, about five miles to the southeastward of the Laurian silver mines, was the little mining city of Sunion. There was an old castle at this place, which, like that in the forest of Sicily,²⁴ was under the ægis of a powerful divinity who recognized the workingman and protected him, whatever his deeds or his guilt, so long as he could hold himself within its walls.

It was about the close of the first Labor war of Eunus of Sicily that another enormous and horribly bloody strike occurred in the mines of Laurium.²⁵ The men undertook and carried out the same plan as that of Decelia, and struck work to the number of more than a thousand.²⁶ It must have been a memorable and shockingly sanguinary event. Sunion was the stronghold of the silver mines.²⁷ By the appearance of things as presented to us in the meagre details given, no improvement for the comfort of the miners had ever been introduced since the great strike of Decelea. The poor creatures were still suffering under the lash, delving 360 out of the 365 days in the year, naked, men and women indiscriminately tugging under the clubs of heartless foremen and directors, the same as ages before,²⁸ That these poor

²⁴ See Second Sicilian Labor War, chap. xi. where it is related that the strikers were actually shielded by the god of the castle, and no one dared to disturb them until they had organized that mighty rebellion.

²⁵ A full account of this strike-war occurs in chap. x. pp. 201-241 q. v.

²⁶ Augustin de civ. d. III, 26, tells us also of a great uprising of the miners in Macedonia.

²⁷ Böckh, Laurische Silberbergwerk, 8, 90.

²⁸ Athenæus, Deipnosophistæ, VI. p. 271: quoting E. Poseidonius, the continuator of the Histories of Polybius says: "Καὶ αἱ πολλαὶ δὲ αὐταὶ Ἀττικαὶ μυριάδες τῶν οἰκετῶν δεδεμέναι εἰργάζοντο τὰ μέταλλα. Ποσειδώνιος γοῦν ὁ φιλόσοφος καὶ ἀποστάντας φησὶν αὐτοὺς καταφονεῦσαι μὲν τοὺς ἐπὶ τῶν μετάλλων φύλακας, καταλα-

people, many of whom were freedmen had their labor organizations is proved beyond a shadow of doubt. Böckh comments upon the passage of Demosthenes against Pantæstus,³⁹ showing a quarrel of the contractors in the mines with the trade unions. These quarrels were frequent occurrences in those days. It might have been some similar trouble that caused the uprisings we are describing, although it occurred in later times.

More than a thousand of the miners one day simultaneously struck work and proceeded in a body to the protecting castle of Sunion where they claimed and secured protection from the divine guardian that watched over this holy institution.⁴⁰

Should any one complain of us for dragging religion into our history of the ancient lowly, their folly will here be seen. It is another of the numerous instances showing that labor, politics and religion were all institutions of governβέσθαι δὲ τὴν ἐπὶ Σουνίῳ ἀκρόπολιν καὶ ἐπὶ πολὺν χρόνον πορθέσθαι τὴν Ἀττικὴν. Οὗτος, δὴν ὁ καιρὸς, ὅτε καὶ ἐν Σικελίᾳ δένδρεα τῶν δούλων ἀποστάσις ἐγένετο. See also Böckh, S. 123.

³⁹ See Demosth, Ag. Pant. 966-7. The eranoi mentioned were the veritable trade unions, corresponding with the Roman collegia, the French jurandes and the English trade unions. The thiasoi, as we persistently explain, were that branch of the eranoi which had in charge the entertainments and solemnities. We have already shown that slaves often belonged to the unions. Foucart, (Associations Religieuses Chez Les Grecs, p. 121 and 219, inscription No. 88), mentions an important inscription showing that one Xanthos a Lycian slave belonging to a Roman named Caius Orbipus, founded a temple at the mines and consecrated it to the moon god. This moon god in return for the favor protected the slaves. The slab bears evidence from which we quote the first six lines as follows:

Ξάνθος Λύκιος Γαίου Ὀρβίου καθείδρυσεν τὸ ἱερὸν οὐνοῦ Μηνὸς
Τυράννου, αἰρετίσαντος τοῦ θεοῦ, ἐκ ἀγαθῆς τύχης καὶ μεθένα ἀκάθαρτον προσάγειν, καθαρῶς δὲ ἀπὸ σκόρων καὶ χοιρέων καὶ γυναικῶν, λουσαμένους δὲ κατακέφαλα αὐθημερὸν εἰσπορεύεσθαι, καὶ ἐκ τῶν γυναικείων διὰ ἑπτὰ ἡμερῶν λουσαμένην κατα-κέφαλα εἰσπορεύεσθαι αὐθημερὸν, καὶ ἀπὸ νεκροῦ διὰ ἡμερῶν δεκά.

The remarks of Foucart in the text, p. 121 are: "Celui qui, vers le deuxième siècle après notre ère, introduisit dans l'Attique le culte de Mên, était un esclave lycien, employé par un propriétaire romain aux travaux des mines. C'était le dieu lui-même qui, dans une apparition ou dans un songe, l'avait invité à élever le temple. Aussi le fondateur a-t-il pris soin de répéter, dans les deux inscriptions, qu'il exécutait le désir de Mên: c'était mettre ainsi sous sa protection le règlement qu'il édictait: Moi, Xanthos, Lycien, appartenant à Caius Orbipus, j'ai consacré le temple de Mên Tyrannos, pour me conformer à la volonté du dieu." We would like to ask how a poor slave working in the mines could found, erect and consecrate a great temple so solid that its ruins and inscriptions remain as testimony to this day? Foucart in his desire to prove that all those inscriptions were purely religious and nothing more, forgets that a slave so lowly could do no such thing. He was simply managing officer of a great trade union so Democratic that social distinctions were unknown to it. This eranos erected the temple.

⁴⁰ Schambach, Der Italische Sklavenaufstand, S. 5: "Um 620 a. u.-194 v. Chr. empörten sich die in den Laurischen Silberberken arbeitenden Sklaven, tödteten ihre Wächter, nahmen das Kastell von Sunion ein und verwüsteten Attika lange Zeit."

ment. Let the reader imagine a thousand workingmen safely protected from the most deadly enemies, by a god! But not only for a day or two were they thus screened from the wrath of armed soldiers who had orders to spear every one of the strikers the instant he was seen outside the sacred pale, but for months this continued and there were battles fought and frequent and successful sallies made by the workingmen all under the protecting arm of the god.

The strikers killed their overseers, rushed into the town, took possession, got the temple to sleep in, organized themselves for combat, took the arms from the armories, and for a long time laid waste the country on every side, remaining masters of the stronghold within. The mayor of the city, one Heraklitos,⁴¹ after their rage was probably spent, succeeded in defeating them when in all probability the usual brutalities of wholesale crucifixion were enacted and nearly every one put to death. This is the more certain because at this time, B. C. 133, the Romans were not only masters of all Greece, but their contractors were operating the silver mines at Laurium, for which kind of employment they had a peculiar fondness.

Another strike and bloody stampede of a similar kind took place at the gold mines of Pangætus in Macedonia, which was of sufficient magnitude to get into the history of Augustin, and Schambach mentions it as another important occurrence.⁴²

⁴¹ Orosius, V. 9: "In metallis quoque Atheniensium idem tumultus servilis ab Heraclito prætore discussus est."

⁴² Schambach, Der Italische Sklavenaufstand, S. 5: "Auch die griechische Welt wurde in ähnlicher Weise, wenn auch in geringerer Ausdehnung, heimgesucht. Nach Augustin de civ. III, 26 verwüsteten kurz vor dem Ausbruche des ersten sicilischen Sklavenkrieges empörte Sklavenbanden Macedonien und die anstossenden Gebiete."

CHAPTER VI.

GRIEVANCES.

LABOR TROUBLES AMONG THE ROMANS. MORE BLOODY PLANS OF SALVATION TRIED.

THE IRASCIBLE PLAN in Italy—Epidemic Uprisings—Attempt to Fire the City of Rome and have Things common—Conspiracy of Slaves at the Metropolis—Two Traitors—Betrayal—Deaths on the Roman Gibbet—Another Great Uprising at Setia—Expected Capture of the World—Land of Wine and Delight—Again the Traitor, the Betrayal and Gibbet—The Irascible Plan a Failure—Strike of the Agricultural Laborers in Etruria—Slave Labor—Character of the Etruscans—Expedition of Glabro—Fighting—Slaves Worst—Punishment on the dreadful Cross, the ancient Block for the Low-born—Enormous Strike in the Land of Labor Organizations—One Glimpse at the Cause and Origin of Italian Brigandage—Laborers, Mechanics and Agriculturists Driven to Despair—The great Uprising in Apulia—Fierce Fighting to the Dagger's Hilt—The Overthrow, the Dungeon and the Cross.—Proof Dug from Fragments of Lost History.

STRIKES and labor mutinies are known to have occurred at Rome. There was one of a desperate nature in the year 417, B. C., while Lanatus, P. Lucretius and Spurius Rutilus were tribunes under the consuls Vibulanus and Capitolinus.¹ This was during the Peloponnesian war and the fact that it occurred about the same time with the great strike of the 20,000² miners and artisans at Athens, shows that the assertion made by the investigation of the United States Bureau of Labor, that panics and depressions are simultaneous and somewhat epidemic in character, is true.³ This remarkable phenomenon will repeatedly exhibit itself as we proceed. Livy states that in the same year the city of Cumæ in Campania, long inhabited by the Greeks, but located only a short distance to the southward of Rome, had been taken.⁴ Undoubtedly some of the conspirators whose story we are about to recount, were Greeks. Syracuse, a Greek-speaking city, being brought into contact at the same time by the novel adventures of Nicias and Cimon, must have afforded the slaves an opportunity of hearing the news of the great strike pending at Decelea. On the whole, judging from the established fact that strikes and uprisings among workmen are nearly always contagious, it may safely be set down as probable that these historical events were simultaneous. At any rate, the warning words of Macrobius, that "the more slaves the more enemies"⁵ would have been applicable to both Greeks and Romans; for though delivered subsequently, they were always true.

¹ Livy, Annales, lib. IV. 45.

² Authors differ a little as to dates. The difference is agreed to within three years: i. e. B. C. 413 for the Athenian and 417 for the Roman strike.

Enthused by some subtle agency, whether of emissaries from secret societies, or straggling travelers or pirates bringing exaggerated accounts from Greece, or whether goaded to the act by their own misery neither of which will ever be explained, we know that in the night, in the year 417, according to our own reckoning, or 419 according to Bücher,⁶ the slaves in a conjuration they had previously concocted, arose and attempted to fire the city of Rome. Their hatred was not only against their bonds per se, but also extremely intense against the aristocracy who, ever since the time of their beloved king Servius Tullius, B. C. 578-534, had oppressed them through both fear and jealousy. Tullius was the 6th Roman king; and of all others since the great Numa the most friendly to the poor and lowly. His sympathy was the stronger for his having once been a slave himself. He restored the arrangement of Numa that had regulated their trades and economic relations. He upheld the old trade organization. As to the slaves, it is probable

³ Consult First Annual Report of the United States Bureau of Labor, 1886, pp. 15 and 290 referring to panics and depressions.

⁴ Liv. lib. IV. cap. 44, fin. Cumæ was also the birthplace of Blossius the rich labor agitator, q. v. chapter on Aristonicus.

⁵ Macrobius, Saturnaliorum Libri, l. 11.

⁶ Bücher, Aufstände der unfreien Arbeiter, S. 24.

that he also greatly assisted them. All who could count upon enough freedom, he organized. He added to the first class of Numa's system two centuries.⁷ This was recognizing in them some power of defence and an element of dignity. When this good man died, the nobility, mad with jealousy, overturned some of the laws and regulations he had established. Even during his life, such was their hatred that they plotted an indiscriminate slaughter in which many poor working people fell victims. Before he died, he caused to be engraved or otherwise chronicled, a constitution which greatly favored the slave population and the freedmen; but it was swept out of existence by those who succeeded him.

To clearly exhibit the state of human credulity in ancient times as well as to trace the origin of the proletarian theory of Saviors and the prevalent beliefs in immaculate conceptions, it may here be stated that Servius Tullius was imagined a descendant of a slave on his mother's side and of a god on his father's. This may really and consistently with the Pagan faith have been perfectly true; because according to that religion any paterfamilias, or head of a noble gens family was a god and there was a law giving him privilege to have children by his female slaves.⁸ All strikes and uprisings had been easily subdued under Servius Tullius. The massacre of the slaves alluded to was not in the least, so far as we have information, instigated by him, but by the jealous nobility who could not bear to see a favor shown the poor whom they despised. After King Tarquin acceded to the throne and the good work of Tullius was destroyed, they seem to have revived their old uneasiness; and no doubt many uprisings actually took place which have never been mentioned in history. Thus, 143 years elapsed before the occurrence of the scene we have introduced. The intelligence regarding this horror is exceedingly meagre. Livy simply relates that the happiness of the Roman people was this year disturbed, not by a defeat of the army this time, but by "a great danger." He characterizes it indeed, as prodigious.⁹ Thus, though all the particulars are not given the probabilities are, that it was a memorable affair.

⁷ Orelli, Inscriptionum Latinarum Collectio, nos. 1803, 2443, 4105; Livy, I. 48; Drumann, S. 154; Plutarch, Numa, 17.

⁸ Granier, Hist. des Classes Ouvrières, p. 70. But the best proof of this is Dionysius of Halicarnassus, lib I.. Consult also Bombardini, De Carcere et antiquo ejus Usu, quoting the law: "Romulus permisit maritis jus vitæ ac necessitudinis in uxores suas indulgere."

A certain number of slaves of Rome formed a conspiracy to secretly set fire to the city in the night. The plan was to fire the houses in many places at once. Then, when the buildings were ablaze, they expected a stampede of the people as sometimes occurs at a burning theatre or church, on which occasion there settles a horror and a craze, the people losing their wits and thus falling an easy prey to a few well organized ruffians who, with a stern leader are able so shrewdly to command and manage as to demolish, plunder and make off with much that the flames leave unconsumed. This was the intention of the Roman slave conspiracy. They made their plans to throw the city into a vast confusion and at a point when flames and fright combined to perfect the moral chaos, to seize the arms from the armories and whatever else was available, put the citizens to the sword, set their fellow slaves free, and having completed the work of devastation, take possession of the property, occupy the citadels and the capitol and settle down in the enjoyment of the women, whom they did not propose to hurt in their general massacre of the men. In the act of carrying out this prodigious carnage they were betrayed by two of the conspirators as is commonly the case in such attempts. As a result the ringleaders were seized by the officers of justice and crucified.¹⁰

It is very singular that Livy, usually elaborate when dwelling upon an important event, should so peremptorily dismiss this subject which he introduces as one of the historical events of Rome in which the Roman people, as it were, through the protecting power of their god Jupiter, narrowly escaped. How many or how many thousands were crucified, excepting the two who exposed the conspiracy to Jupiter,¹¹ is not stated. We recall this to mind with the more interest, since later uprisings like those of Eunus, Aristonicus and Spartacus were followed by the execution of thousands upon the cross. The two traitors were richly rewarded with money and freedom.¹³

⁹ Liv. lib. IV. 45: "Annus felicitate populi Romani periculo potius ingenti quam clade insignis" Cf. Dionys. Halicar, excerpt xi.

¹⁰ Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Æschæol. Rhomaike, xii. 5.

¹¹ Idem, IV. 45: "Avertit neand consilia Jupiter, indeisque ducum comprehensi sontes pœas dederunt."

Bücher reckons the year in which occurred another uprising in the heart of Latium, Italy, to have been B. C. 194. It was a very dangerous strike of slaves. The old Pomptine swamps in ancient times near the mountain city of Setia were infested with the runaway slaves, who to exist, were obliged to sally out from their glades where they hid by day, and played a rôle of brigands. All about the swamps on the higher levels, the soil was celebrated for productiveness. Setan wines were renowned for their relish. The city itself was between these marshes and the mountain cliffs, affording the brigands an immense range of forests, rocks, acclivities and jungles, which could be used as fastnesses when the pursuers or the weather would not permit the fugitives to live in the marshes below. Of course the little fortified Setia full of good things, but maintained by the labor of slaves, was an object of envy and a moral stumbling block to this order of submission within, and their cupidity or vengeance without. There were also numbers of other small cities and towns in this region. The encroachments of the rich gens families upon the ager publicus or public lands, which under the laws of Numa and Servius Tullius had been cultivated by the small farmers, sometimes by unions of farmers and as it were, in a socialistic way, had driven out the happy olden days and flogged into their places the horrid slave system of cultivation. Here, at the foot of this spur of the Appenines, as in the valley of the Guicus about Pergamum and the exquisite plateau of Enna,¹⁴ the greedy slave owner had fastened upon the limbs of his human chattels the clanking chains of enforced bondage and declared a lockout of the former guilds who worked the government lands on shares. That they had no other right to these lands than that of lawless might we shall in our chapter on Spärtacus, sufficiently portray.¹⁵

These landlords, it is conceded by every one who has given attention to the subject,¹⁶ acted in every way the

¹³ Idem: "Indicibus dena milla gravis æris, quæ tum divitiæ habebantur, ex ærario munerata et libertas præmium fuit."

¹⁴ See detailed accounts of the great uprisings of the workingmen at these places. chapters, vii.—x.

¹⁵ Chapter xii.

¹⁶ Drum. Arb. u. Comm. S. 152-3.

part of high-handed land pirates, in seizing the farms from the former lessees of the government of Rome. Without doubt these, maddened by their outrageous deprivations, instigated many a revolt of the slaves who had, as chattels, and under the bitterest urgents of lash and threat, been forced to take their places. It must also be here stated that it was at about this epoch, just before the great slave insurrections of Eunus in Sicily and of Aristonicus at Pergamus which occurred during the great Agrarian commotions of the Gracchi. It was a time when a third of the honest, hard working population were being literally choked away from their means of earning a living for their families.¹⁶ There is no lack of information regarding the grievances of either the slaves impressed into the labor they hated, or the former tillers, locked out from the labor they loved. It is therefore without wonder that we hear of the outbreak or strike of B. C. 198. The numerous bands of slave bandits prowling among the swamps and mountain fastnesses formed an alliance¹⁷ with the slaves within the city, who were as dissatisfied with their shackles as were the degraded agricultural wretches delving outside. The collusion spread from Setia to Præneste 35 miles to the north and to Circeji a few miles beyond. About the time the conjurators were ready to make their deadly dash, was the moment when the people of Setia were to have a gala-day. What sort of festivity is not exactly clear. But judging from the popularity of the gladiatorial games not only at Rome but at that time, also in most of the provincial cities, it perhaps may be plausibly conjectured that the plays alluded to by Livy were the horrible butcheries of the arena. This public event afforded the conspirators an opportunity. Their plan was to take advantage of the enthusiasm of the games when least the populace were on the alert, crash upon the people, plunder the town, seize weapons and munitions necessary; then striking for the town of Norba, commit the same violence there, murder the masters and most of the other patricians and proceed to other cities in the vicinity repeating the carnage at each place until they gained the mastery of the world! Under the allowance of instruction the slaves of that period enjoyed, this impossible scheme should not seem absurd; since they doubtless had little knowledge or conception of a world stretching beyond their vision and experience.

¹⁶ Plut. Tiberius Gracchus, makes a plaintive comment on their sufferings

¹⁷ Bücher, Aufstände d. unf. Arb. S. 28.

Again the traitor. Setia was under the prætorship of C. Cornelius Lentulus. Just at the outbreak of the strike, but whether during the tumult of a bloody fray we are uninformed, two of the conspirators lost courage and betrayed the plot. Livy says: "The object was, when Setia was once in their hands, by the combined result of murder and sudden tumult to first seize and similarly serve the cities of Norba and Circeji. Information of this terrible plot was carried to Rome and laid before the Prætor, L. Cornelius Merula, by two slaves who arrived from the scene before daybreak and in systematic order exposed the anticipated operations of the insurrectionists."¹⁸

Instantaneous action was now necessary at Rome. The Senate was in a few minutes convoked. The two Roman consuls for that year, (B. C. 198), Sextus Ælius Pætus and T. Quinctius Flaminius, were absent with their commands in Gaul and elsewhere; so Merula one of the four ædiles or tribunes of the people, was called to the task of suppressing the conspiracy. At this impromptu meeting of the Roman Senate it was ordered that Merula should take the field in person. There being at that instant very few regular troops at command, no time was lost in waiting orders to mass them, and it appears that he set out immediately with few, gathering militia as he proceeded on his way to Setia; for it appears that before reaching the scene of the danger the number of his forces reached 2,000 men. No particulars are given regarding the attack on the conspirators. We have no information as to whether there occurred a conflict. We are informed that the ring leaders of the conspiracy were arrested; also that the slaves were thrown into great confusion. Livy states that the town of Setia was the place where many hostages from the Carthaginian army were kept. The battle of Zama between Scipio and Hannibal, A. D. 202, had resulted disastrously to those old enemies of Rome and these hostages were kept by the conqueror as a pledge against further hostilities. Being penned in together, they also naturally joined the conspiracy and the ring-leaders referred to by Bücher, may have been some of the veritable warriors of the great Hannibal now pining in custody as hostages around the barracks of Setia.

¹⁸ Liv. XXXII. 26. "Quem ad modum Gallia præter spem quieta eo anno fuit, ita circa urbem servilis prope tumultus est excitatus. Obsides Carthaginensium Setiæ custodiebantur. Cum iis, ut principum liberis, magna vis servorum erat. Augebant eorum numerum, ut ab recenti Africo bello, et ab ipsis Setinis captiva aliquot nationis eius empta ex præda mancipia. Cum conjurationem fecissent, missis ex eo numero primum qui in Setino agro, deinde circa Norbam et Circeios servitia sollicitarent, satis iam omnibus præparatis ludis qui Setiæ prope diem futuri erant, spectaculo intentum populum adgredi statuerant, Setia per cædem et repentinum tumultum capta, Norbam et Circeios occupare. Hujus rei tam fœdæ indicium Roman ad L. Cornelium Merulam prætorem urbis delatum est. Servi duo ante lucem ad eum venerunt, atque ordine omnia quæ acta futuraque erant exposuerunt. Quibus domi custodiri iussis, prætor senatu vocato edoctoque, quæ indices adferrent, proficisci ad eam conjurationem querendam atque opprimendam iussus, cum quinque legatis profectus obvius in agris sacramento rogatos arma capere et sequi cogebat. Hoc tumultuario detectu duobus milibus ferme hominum armatis Setiam, omnibus quo pergeret ignaris, venit. Ibi raptim principibus conjurationis comprehensis fuga servorum ex oppido facta est. Dimissis deinde per agros qui vestigarent . Egregia duorum opera servorum indicum et unius liberi fuit. Ei centum milia gravis æris dari patres iusserunt, servis vicena quina milia æris et libertatem; pretium eorum ex ærario solutum est dominis. Haud ita multo post ex eiusdem conjurationis reliquiis nuntiatum est servitia Præneste occupatura. Eo L. Cornelius prætor profectus de quingentis fere hominibus, qui in ea noxa erant, supplicium sumpsit. In timore civitas fuit obsides captivosque Pœnorum ea moliri. Itaque et Romæ vigiliæ per vicos servatæ, iussique circumire eas minores magistratus; et triumviri carceris lautumiarum intentiorem custodiam habere iussi; et circa nomen Latinum a prætore litteræ missæ, ut et obsides in privato servarentur, neque in publicum prodeundi facultas daretur, et captivi ne minus decem pondo compedibus vincti in nulla alia quam in carceris publici custodia essent."

But here again, as in the story of Spartacus, the excellent history of Livy is broken off and lost. How much of the real story is missing may never be known. But for the epitome or heading of this book we should be left in the dark entirely as to the results; but there is a passage in this which states that 2,000 of the conspirators were arrested and slaughtered.²⁰ Judging from the usual method of servile executions, it might be inferred that the captured like those of Spartacus, Eunus and Aristonicus, were crucified upon the gibbet. It is more probable however, since some of them were Carthaginian veterans, that part of them were crucified and the remainder butchered; because it was against the Roman code of honor to hang veteran soldiers or others than those of the servile race, upon the ignominious cross. Jesus a religio-political offender was crucified by the Romans in a Roman province, not because of his offence, which might have received a nobler or less ignominious punishment, but because he was a workingman, not a soldier; and consequently ranked with the servile class in contradistinction to the noble class of the gens family, of the Pagan religion.

¹⁹ Aufstände d. unfreien Arb. S. 29.

²⁰ Liv. lib. XXXII. Epitomy: "Conjuratio servorum, facta de solvendis Carthageniesium obsidibus oppressa est; duo milia necati sunt."

The uprising was suppressed after a struggle, the duration and the particulars of which are left for our curiosity to surmise. But the causes of the grievances among the slaves were too profound to be easily stamped out. Merula and his legions, their reeking sabers and victory-boasting tongues, their tales of gibbet and dagger-to-the-hilt, the agony of woe and death, had scarcely had time to settle into the first lull; the perpetrators of the treachery which discovered the plot had but received their reward²¹ by order of the Roman Senate, when news came that from the direction of Præneste the spirit of insurrection was again rife—this time in and about that city—and that a plot had been disclosed among the slaves who again in great numbers were caught making a singular spring in hopes of making themselves masters of it. Again their design was baffled. The Roman forces were once more sent out with orders to exterminate the slaves. The same prætor, L. Cornelius Merula, was soon on the warpath and as before, the inexperienced proletaries, among whom were many Punic hostages with their slender preparations and want of arms, could stand no ground with their powerful enemy. A battle must have been fought of considerable importance, and the result was certainly a disaster to the slaves and Carthaginian hostages and prisoners to whose secret machinations the blame is principally attributed by Dr. Bücher, also Livy himself by implication.²² The number of poor wretches who suffered on the scaffold reached 500, making 2,500 public executions, besides the number not given in either case who were killed in the conflicts before being overcome. A great turbulence was caused throughout the community.

Strong vigilance was now instituted at Rome to protect the smaller places from a recurrence of those dangers which had stamped their terror upon the inhabitants. The triumvirs ordered a closer guard to be kept over the great underground prison called carcer lautumiae,²³ where those taken prisoners were placed. It was ordered that the Carthagenian hostages be degraded to the condition of slaves to work for private individuals and disallowed further privilege of being seen any more in public or having any more enjoyment in the open world. The shackles in which the prisoners were chained, were ordered to weigh not less than 10 pounds. The prison in which they were thenceforth to be forever kept was the public carcer, a description of which may now be interesting.

²¹ "Egregia duorum" &c. Liv. XXXII. cap. 26.

²² Livy, Idem; Büch. Aufstände &c. 29: "Allgemein mass man geheimen Umtrieben der punischen Geiseln und Gefangenen die Schuld bei."

"There was a place" says the Italian jurist Bombardini,²⁴ "in the ancient Roman prison, called the Tullian, cell, whither you descend by a ladder to the distance of 12 feet, into a damp hole, excavated in the earth. It was walled in on all sides and vaulted overhead having the sections adjoined. It had a putrid odor and a frightful outlook." But this is but the beginning, (B. C. 650-500,) of what it had developed into, by the time of which we speak. (B. C. 198). Long before this the prisoners here were at work. "Their masters saw them but rarely; their food was lowered to them through breathing holes, also their straw and scanty clothing."²⁵ Varro likewise tells of the latomia or quarry and the ergastulum called the prison Tulliana.²⁶ At any rate the public prison still to be seen, was a deep and spacious excavation under the Capitoline Hill, which had been made by prison labor. The object of the ancients in setting prisoners at work was twofold. First, vengeance rather than correction, as in our days of comparative enlightenment. Secondly, economy; for the ancients had the contract system with all its brutalities and horrors. The stone quarried out of these diggings furnished good building material and the holes thus left made prisons for the workmen who quarried it. Thus, in course of ages Rome became what Pliny called the Urbs pensilis,²⁷ or city hanging in the air. Most of these stu-

²³ Bombardini, De Carcere et antiquo ejus Usu, cap. iii.

²⁴ Idem, Cap. iii, p. 746 of Thesaurus Grævii et Gronovii, Supplement.

²⁵ Maurice, Hist. Politique et Anecdote des Prisons de la Seine, pp. 1-4.

²⁶ Varro, De Re Rustica, cap. iii. 8 speaks of them and of the popular opinion that these holes were nurseries of serpents. Cf. Prudentius, Hymn V.

²⁷ Nat. Hist. Speaking in another place (lib XXVIII. 4.), Pliny thinks they were dug by Tullius Hostilius: "L. Piso primo annalium auctor est, Tullum Hostilium regem ex Numæ libris eodem, multi vero, magnarum rerum fata et ostenta verbis permutari. Cum in Tarpeio fodientes delubro fundamenta, caput humanum invenissent, missis ob id ad se legatis pendous catacombs are still to be seen in a more or less perfect state of preservation. Like the vast catacombs of Paris, they were originally stone quarries; then some of them differentiated into sewers, cloacae, some into public prisons, some into subterranean workshops, ergastula. The person condemned, if of low rank without family or money, was sent ad opus publicum, to the public works. "It was a place into which people were snatched; excavated from sharp rocks, immensely deep; a huge cutting or grotto quarried in the depths with passages interrupted by great, sharp-cornered rocks between which the victims' bodies squeezed. Projecting crags bristled as they sprang forth from the walls in darkness of midnight and frowned horribly over the abyss—a place of all others, from which the person doomed, when once thrown in, never afterwards saw the light of day." "Of course the convicts were furnished with lamps to light their steps and hands at work.

The reader is now left to judge for himself as to the justice or injustice of the causes lurking at the bottom of all ancient strikes.

We are again grateful to Dr. Karl Bücher, who reminds us of the account sparingly given by Livy, of another great uprising, B. C. 196, among the agricultural laborers of Etruria.²⁸ This noble country stretched from the Tiber on the south to the Ticino on the north. The rapturous landscapes of the Arno, the many beautiful Appenine lakes and mountains were Etruscan. No land ever subjugated by Rome possessed more agricultural or mineral wealth. Its original inhabitants possessed the refined civilization whence Rome took most of her prosperity. Bold, inventive, mechanical, progressive, the Etruscans ill-brooked the fetters of slavery fastened upon them like gyves by the greedy land grabbers who took possession of the soil, somewhat in the manner of the land owners of Great Britain and Ireland at the present time. The descendants of the ancient Etruscan stock held much of the land, Etruriæ celeberrimus vates Olenns Calenus præclarum id fortunatumque cernens, interrogatione in suam gentem transferre tentavit," etc. For a description see Prudentius, Hymn V.

²⁸ Eutrope? Epit. Rom. Hist. Era of Tarquin.

²⁹ Aufstände d. unſ. Arb S. 29.

Granier, de Cass. Hist. Classes Ouv. chaps. xiii, xiv.; Orell. nos. 3346; 3347, 3673, 1239, of Inscr. Lat. Col. See also within account of the Vectigalia as free agriculturists and to them the government had long farmed it on shares, thus securing to the laborers a good living from the proceeds and to the government a good revenue which was paid, not in money but in kind, the rent tax being collected through the celebrated system of the vectigalia.³⁰ The slave system of the rich lords, who, without a tittle of right by law, and indeed in direct defiance of the precedents established by Numa and Servius Tullius, as well as the Licinian law, which, through the intrigues of the great proprietors had, from its passage, remained a dead letter, was now becoming a terrible scourge.

Indeed, in after days, Tiberius Gracchus on his way to Spain, passed through Etruria and found to his horror that once populous land in the hands of a few lordly masters who had completely locked the original agriculturists out and supplanted them with slaves. The scene of slavery and woe so stirred the blood of this noble Roman that he devoted his remaining life to the great agitation which is famous to this day as the agrarian movement with the bloody commotions that attended them, resulting in his own assassination. Such was the terrible condition of human slavery at that time, B. C. 196. In fact the slave system had to a large extent, driven out the once free and prosperous labor not only of Etruria but also of lower Italy, Sicily, Asia Minor, large parts of Greece, Spain and the smaller islands; and Rome was becoming the fattening pen of the arrogant grandees who lived in degenerate profligacy upon the lash-enforced drudgery of millions of slaves. Perhaps in telling these portentous truths to the world in the light of a social historiographer, we are among the first to discover the germ of a deeply hidden virtue in the revolt whose history occupies but eight poverty-solemnized lines in the great history of Livy. But to the student of sociology even this poor sketch brings back to us the profound wisdom of Anaxagoras and Aristotle who taught that all knowledge, all virtue and all progress emanate from humblest origin and that we can have nothing permanent or perfect except through investigation and experiment involving the severest trials. And although the poor slaves fell in thousands by the lash, the dungeon, the cross and although hundreds of years elapsed before the bonds of their slavery were broken yet who shall say their dying agonies here did not contribute to the cumulous of forces which at last swept their fetters away?

³⁰ Aufst. d. unfr. Srb. "Trotzdem gelang es ihm nicht ohne heftigen Kampf die einzelnen Haufen zu zerspringen."

L. Furius and Claudius Marcellus were consuls at Rome when this agrarian uprising occurred. Their offices of state requiring their attention, the prætor, M. Acilius Glabro had in charge the "peace of the community." Little is known of the details of this uprising. The slaves were inhumanly oppressed and ready to accept desperate conditions if they held out the least promise of success in freeing them of their sufferings. On the other hand, the old cultivators had for centuries lived in ease upon the public lands and their organizations interlinked with those of the collegia and sodalicia which were just then being treated with severe censure and even threat by the Roman citizens who managed legislation. Efforts were begun about this time to suppress most of the labor organizations. The wealthy who were engaged in driving out free agricultural labor and supplanting it by that of slaves on the plantations, were particularly bitter against free labor, both in city and country.

When the news of the uprising reached Rome, Glabro immediately set out with one of the two legions of soldiers at command. By the appearance of things, the organization was not complete among the insurgents. The slaves, as Livy calls them in his sweeping terms, but more probably also the disaffected part of community generally and now locked out—those who formerly tilled the land on shares and also the slaves themselves—all of whose cause was common, met Glabro hilt to hilt and in a bloody battle were overcome. Bücher surmises that though the Romans were victorious, it was not without a heavy battle.⁸¹ Great was the number of fallen workingmen and the number of those of their ranks taken prisoners was still greater. The leaders of the revolt were scourged and hung upon the cross. The remaining slaves were given up to their merciless masters to receive at their hands a double portion of hardships in the future. The freedmen engaged in this insurrection would, under the Roman custom of treating enemies taken in battle, be sold as slaves or held as criminals and sent to the quarries and mines to linger for life at hard labor; for Bücher here correctly states that only under extraordinary circumstances did the Romans ever treat with lenity their captured enemies and the slave insurgents of all others, are known to have received the most relentless measure of malignity at their hands."

⁸¹ Livy, XXXIII. cnp 36: "Ex his (the strikers) multi occisi multi capti: alios everbratos crucibus adfixit, qui principes conjurationis fuerant, alios domi restituunt."

One of the countries in which Spartacus was best received and from among whose people he obtained the largest number and the best volunteers who accepted with gratitude his offers of freedom, was Apulia. It was that rich, well watered, pastoral tract lying to the north and bordering on the Tarentine gulf. About 120 years before the great and memorable war of Spartacus broke out, these fine lands lying between the eastern slope of the Appenines and the Adriatic, were prey of the slave system. "Where earlier, the industrious farmers had thrived in happiness and plenty, herdsmen now in loneliness drove and herded countless flocks of cattle and sheep belonging to Roman Senators and knights."²² Apulia being on the opposite side of the mountains from Rome and most of the opulent cities of Italy, was a region topographically suitable for robbers, both of land and sea. To the west were the mountains, whose rocks and forests afforded shelter for men of desperate nerve. The introduction of servile hands through the slave trade which had driven free labor from the agricultural and pastoral regions of Italy had naturally been followed by a variety of desperadoes whose bands at the time of our story, infested the whole stretch. He also surmises with much intelligence that these organized gangs were not without a distinct purpose in working for their fellow men, and our own inspection satisfies us that a philosophy or culture had from high antiquity existed for the redemption of the poor everywhere.

In another chapter we shall show the relationship between the societies of Dionysoi and those of the Bacchantes. Indeed there appears little difference between them. In both words, one Latin, the other Greek, we have the same meaning. They were in Greece, in the islands, in Asia Minor and Palestine, mostly organizations of artificers or skilled mechanics;²⁴ but because they held festivities and conducted them on methods peculiar to themselves as well as because they were working people, they were looked upon with suspicion. No author of antiquity or orator could speak with respect of the bacchanals. We know by the inscriptions that they had many societies at Rome and in the provincial cities. Cicero and Livy spurn them. No doubt the obloquy they suffered drove them into these fastnesses and made them, by sheer compulsion, assume suspicious attitudes. However this may be, we find Livy associating them with another great strike or uprising of the workingmen which occurred B. C. 185-184, in Apulia and along the coast between there and Bruttium.

²² Büch. Aufst. d. unf. Arb. S. 31.

²³ Lüders, Dionys. Künst. passim.

It was during the days of the stern Cato's power, in the consulship of Appius Claudius Pulcher and M. Sempronius Tuditanus.²⁵ The so-called province of Apulia was in the care of the prætor, L. Postumius. This man's watch-ground was Apulia and the shores of the gulf of Tarentum. A few years afterwards the famous Spartacus led his army of rebel workingmen, consisting of volunteer gladiators, shepherds, bacchantes and slaves, to Metapontem, where he spent the memorable winter of B. C. 73-72.²⁶ Too just to allow disorder, too wise to permit even a draught of wine to be drunk in carousal, too good to give his loved soldiers the bridle, this modest gladiator here proved himself the terror of the haughty Romans and a prototype of modern military virtue, genius and discipline. And this town was in the very valleys of the scenes of our present story.²⁷ Livy, as is usual with ancient historians, when speaking of the uprisings of the oppressed working classes makes short work of his story. We linger upon his stingy descant because of the peculiarly interesting associations connected with the mightier revolt of the great gladiator chieftain, one hundred and ten years afterwards upon the same spot.

There had been many cases of dissatisfaction, some of which had reached the ears of the vigilant Romans.

²⁴ Livy, XXXIX. cap. 29.

²⁵ Consult chapter xii of this work.

²⁷ Livy, XXXIX. 29, and 41.

²⁶ Büch Aufst. &c. S. 31.

Great organizations among the enslaved shepherds and drovers were heard of. A case was reported in which detachments of half starved cowboys and ploughmen threw away their bondage, knocked down and garroted their overseer, seized his knife, his sword and club and made their way to the mountain caves and jungles whence with desperate revenge and want, they returned reinforced to plunder and sack their master's goods. It got so that the government highways were unsafe; and in ten years from the time of our last story of the strike in Etruria, 192-182, another enormous "slave conspiracy" had been found to exist.

As soon as reliable news of this reached Rome, L. Postumius³⁸ the prætor, or as the same informant names him "proprætor" in another place,³⁹ instantly marched with a large force of troops to the scene.⁴⁰ The prætor had previously had charge of all Apulia and Bruttium. He had the watch of all the Adriatic coast from Rhegium to Mt. Garganus, east of the Appenine range and most likely also a considerable force of troops stationed at different points where Roman praesidia or garrisons existed.⁴¹ This is self evident; since the senators and knights owning the lands and the slaves who worked them were also military officers as well as lawgivers and it was easy for them to legislate for placing the standing army where it should best protect their gluttonous acquirement of wealth.

The details of the manoeuvres, skirmishes and battles gone through with before the climax was reached, are left unwritten. But there can be no doubt that a battle was fought; because, of the total number of the insurgents taken, no less than 7,000 were condemned to the mines and of the great number who were captured many were executed which means, of course, crucified.⁴² Those who were caught were certainly sent either to the mines, ad metallum, to the Roman prison, carcer Tullianus, or to the quarries, lapicidinae. But the most probable thing is,

³⁸ Livy, XXXIX. 41, ad fin: "L. Postumius proprætor, cui Tarentum provincia evenrat, magnas pastorum conjugationes vindicavit et reliquas Bacchanilum quæstioni cum omni est cura."

³⁹ Bücher. Aufstände der unfreien Arbeiter, S. 31, note 2.

⁴⁰ Weissenborn. Com on Livy, xxxv. 20

⁴¹ Livy. XXIIY. 29. "De multis sumptum est supplicium."

⁴² Idem, cep. 41: "Partim comprehensos, Romam ad senatum misit, in carcerem omnes a P. Cornelio conjecti sunt."

that there being so many, they were distributed according to their adjudged guilt, in the three prisons.⁴³ The horrors of either of these three places have been described. But this awful retribution inflicted upon the poor struggling workingmen and their suffering families by the military arm of Rome, protecting slavery the most brutal and demoralizing institution that ever cursed the nations of the earth or whetted the appetites of the greedy by locking out honest laborers from their natural employ, failed to stifle the hopes of those hardy mountaineer farmers whom tyranny had turned into brigands. Bücher renders a word of comment on Livy's short-cut information, to the effect that those who escaped, re-organized their banditti in a distant point and began anew their work of pillage, which he characterizes as having become the plague of the times—a plague which was in effect, the foundation of that terrible brigandage, never suppressed in Italy until in recent years. This, then is the origin of those terrible "bacchanalian orgies"—the innocent workingmen, long organized in the unions or guilds⁴⁴ for self-protection and co-operation entirely under the laws and sanction of Numa and Tullius in the old, happy days of Rome's golden economies, now driven and dispersed to the wailing winds of her night of slavery!

Noble writers of the very ancient past have spoken kindly of the Bacchantes both of the Greek and Latin-speaking races of mankind, and lately Hœckh, the archæologist who has done more than any other man to reveal the true status of ancient life and has uncovered many errors which policy and prejudice have cultivated, openly acknowledges that he finds no element of harm or of wrong intention in the bacchanalian organization among Greek-writing Societies of Asia Minor, and his invaluable evidence we shall bring forward in a subsequent chapter, because he fixes his opinion from the unerring evidence of the stones bearing inscriptions from their own hands.

Hesiod the poet and celebrated master who lived probably more than a thousand years before Christ and came of the lowly stock, was the first known labor agitator. His greatest poem, "Works and Days," full of pleadings for the poor, is the first book on the labor question. He may be styled the father of the emotions of pure sympathy, because the earliest witness.

⁴³ For an elaborate description of the trade unions under Numa, also on Servius Tullius and Clodius, see chapters xiii.—xix. of this work.

But already at his time there were thousands of labor societies that were discussing with him this great problem and with him practically building a cult of co-operation full of the tender sympathies of human brotherhood and of mutual support.

CHAPTER VII.

DRIMAKOS.

A QUEER OLD MAN OF THE MOUNTAINS.

STRIKE OF DRIMAKOS, the Ohian Slave—Co-operation of the Irascible with the Sympathetic—A Desperate Greek Bondsmen at Large—Labor Grievances of the ancient Scio—Temperament and Character of Drimakos—Vast Number of unfortunate Slaves—Revolt and Escape to the Mountains—Old Ruler of the Mountain Crags—Rigid Master and loving Friend—Great Successes—Price offered for his Head—How he lost it—The Reaction—Rich and Poor all mourn his Loss as a Calamity—The Brigands infest the Island afresh since the Demise of Drimakos—The Heroön at his Tomb—An Altar of Pagan Worship at which this Labor Hero becomes the God, reversing the Order of the Ancient Rights—Ruins of his Temple still extant—Athenæus—Nymphodorus—Archæology—Views of modern Philologists.

WE are indebted to the geographer and historian Nymphodorus Siculus for an account of a very remarkable strike and maroon-like revolt of slaves in the island of Scio. This island—the ancient Chios—which lies in the Greek archipelago at a distance of 7 miles from the coast of Asia Minor, contains an area of little more than 500 square miles. It has, from high antiquity, been celebrated for the ever varying beauty of its scenery, its perpetual verdure, its forests that are inaccessible to civilized life, its countless streams and streamlets whose pure waters rush from calcarious steeps and fall into the tiny rivers or the sea.

Chios is aged as the primeval home of the Pelasgians and the Leleges of Cyclopean fame and antiquity, and consequently is Greek in its remotest sense. It was of all lands most accursed with slavery.¹ While the Peloponnesus and Attica recruited their slave ranks with their own sons and daughters and their prisoners of war, Chios betook herself to the disgraceful slave traffic to secure her recruits—a custom undoubtedly borrowed from her neighbors, the Phœnicians. What the tale of startling uprisings and shocking cruelties of these struggling people would be if told, we know not;² for we are obliged to let all knowledge lapse in the æons of an unwritten past and patiently wait until the era of our story, accidentally recorded by Nymphodorus, a geographer, as having transpired a short time before his day.

Judging from this we are able to fix its date,³ not at about 250 years after the birth of Christ as surmised by Dr. Bücher, but at a very much earlier period. We follow the story of Nymphodorus, who received this information directly from the Chians themselves, from whom he must have received his data while visiting the island and its inhabitants in search of information for his book which was a description of the coast of Asia minor and the multitude of islands, large and small, that stud the Archipelago.

¹ All over Greece and especially in Chios in Ionia there was constant fear of slave rebellions. Plato (Republic ix. 5 fin. and in very many other passages), mentions this fact as a constant terror in those days.

² The indications are that there constantly occurred in those times mutinies among the working people. Many of them were prodigious. Dim information of one in Southern Greece is found, which occurred between 300 and 400 years before Christ. The cruelty of masters was so great that when an earthquake destroyed 20,000 people it was believed to be their punishment for cruelty. The all-prevailing fear of being murdered by slaves is frequently hinted at by Plato. To read the eleventh chapter of the first book of Macrobius is really worth the attention of the thoughtful. It is replete with evidence that anciently there was a strong anti-slavery movement. Macrobius, (Saturnationum, I. xi. 7-9, Eyssenhardt), says: "Vis tu cogitare eos quos ius tuum vocas isdem seminibus ortos eodem frui cælo, æque uiuere, æque mori? Serui sunt: immo homines. Serui sunt: immo conserui, si cogitaueris tantundem in utrosque licere fortunæ. Tam tu illum uidere liberum potes quam ille te seruum. Necis qua ætate Hecuba seruire coeperit, qua Cræsus, qua Darei mater, qua Diogenes, qua Plato ipse? Postremo quid ita nomen seruitutis horremus? seruus est quidem, sed necessitate, sed fortasse libero animo seruus est. Hoc illi nocebit si ostenderit quod non sit. Alius libidini seruit, alius auaritiæ, alius ambitioni, omnes spei, omnes timori." Again (Idem 13-14) come the prophetic words: "Non potest amor cum timore misceri. Unde putas adrogantissimum illud manasse prouerbiū quo iactatur totidem hostes nobis esse quot seruos? Non habemus illos hostes sed facimus, cum in illos superbissimi contumeliosissimi crudelissimi sumus et ad rabiem nos cogunt peruenire deliciæ, ut quicquid non ex uoluntate respondit iram furoremque euocet." But it was fear rather than compassion that forced our hard-hearted forefathers to talk in this strain.

³ Schambach, Italische Slavenaufstand, I., S. 5; refers to this slave insurrection in the following clearly expressed language: "Auch das reiche Chios war zu derselben Zeit B. C. 134, der Schauplatz einer wilden Slavenempörung, die erst nach mehreren Jahren unterdrückt wurde. Athenæus VI. He seems to have no doubt as to the era of the story of Drimakos being identical with that of the great servile wars. But what time did it begin? This is the important question. Athenæus says or intimates that Drimakos was in the vigor of manhood when he began the revolt; but he was an old man when he died and up to the last the malcontents held their ground. Now if we agree with Schambach that his "zu derselben Zeit" meant the end of the period, or thereabout, we must add at least 30 years to allow him to become an old man which makes the rebellion to have begun about the year B. C. 364.

The islanders recounted to Nymphodorus that a slave named Drimakos had lived and died in those parts, whose history was remarkable. Consequently this Sicilian Greek, whose errand was knowledge, became curious to know about the strange man Drimakos and all the particulars, in order to embellish the chapter of his "Nomima Asias" or customs and habits of the Asians—in other words, his descriptive geography. And now that our attention is fastened upon so weird an object as a runaway slave with drawn dagger, bolting from his pursuing owner and climbing a crag to a mountain den with a dozen abolitionists as desperate as he, we pause to ask, who is this Nymphodorus?

Alas such curiosity is rewarded with the aggravation of a mystery! We know nothing of Nymphodorus. We only know that he lived and wrote in his geography a description, not only of the island of Scio as it was before the time of Christ, but also of the customs and usages that were practiced by its inhabitants; and interspersed in his work there was many an incident, description and story, one of which was this tale of Drimakos, the runaway slave. We know that this priceless literary gem, like the noble but lost chapters of Diodorus, and Sallust, of Livy, of Fenestella, Dion Cassius, Theophanes, Nicolaus Damascenus, Cæcilius Calactenus and a wealth of others with their flood of facts, come to us only in the second-hand and oblique mention of others who read them before they were destroyed; or sometimes in mutilated fragments of the originals which escaped the vandals who perhaps thought that by robbing posterity of facts that disclosed the beastliness of their institutions they might confer a favor upon the sin as well as the sinners whose power they fawned upon and flattered. At any rate the work of Nymphodorus is lost; and the question remains: who is Nymphodorus and what about Drimakos the Chian runaway slave?

The fact is, Athenæus,⁴ an Egyptian of antiquity, saw and read this book of Nymphodorus the geographer, and in his "Deipnosophistae or Banquet of the Learned," a pot pourri or hodge-podge of science, history and anecdote, reproduced for us the essential facts concerning this affair of Drimakos, which was no little incident to make light of, but a vast insurrection of slaves, like that of Eunus and Spartacus, involving a lifetime, with bloody wars and a great and terrible and successful struggle of "outlaws" against society. It is Athenæus, the middleman then, not Nymphodorus, whom we must follow and carefully scan, picking every word down to the bone, to get the meat of his language; always suspicious enough of translations to avoid them entirely, especially when exhuming such literary mummies as those wrapped and preserved in chemicals musty with the taint of labor.

Nymphodorus in his lost work on the customs and usages of the Asians,⁵ says it was not long before his time that the facts concerning Drimakos occurred. But although no doubts exist regarding the truth of the general facts, nobody is clear as to the exact time of Nymphodorus. Whether the insurrection of the Chian slaves was a spasmodic affair, belonging to one lifetime, or whether the episode of Drimakos was simply one incident distinguished for its magnitude and duration among many that for ages were constantly occurring, is a problem.⁶ We shall present the facts as given in the Deipnosophistae of Athenæus carefully adhering to the points in the text and seasoning the story only to befit the character of our pages for the general reader. But there seems to be no evidence to confute our theory that Nymphodorus wrote his story at least a century before Christ, and that the true age of Drimakos was that of the other great slave rebellions which began to rage about a century and a half before Christ.

⁴ Most chronologists make Athenæus to have lived about A. D. 250. Dr. Bücher, therefore, must certainly be entirely incorrect in putting the date of the work of Nymphodorus at "Mitte des dritten Jahrhunderts nach Christo; Aufstände der unfreien Arbeiter, S. 22, since Athenæus himself lived before that time. We are fully confirmed in the opinion that Drimakos' uprising was contemporaneous with that of Eunus of Sicily and Aristonius of Pergamus, and was an outcrop of that great agitation.

⁵ Νόμιμα Ἀσίας. The island of Chios was only separated from the continent of Asia by a strait 7 miles wide, and easily visible from the main shore. For a good description of this island, see Eckenbrecher: Die Insel Chios, Berlin, 1845.

⁶ Pauly's Real Encyclopædia, Vol. V, S. 193, contains an article from Westermann, discussing the probable time of Nymphodorus, q. v.

From the story as related by Athenæus it does not appear that Drimakos escaped from his master amid scenes of blood-shedding, but that those horrors were reserved for the immediate future. He was then a young man of great sternness and determination, shrinking from nothing he had set his mind upon, and too nervous and sensitive to bear the galling humiliations of slavery. He was also a man of sympathies, and felt for his fellow slaves as well as himself. In such a frame of mind he could not but have felt deeply for the thousands of poor creatures who had been bought or kidnapped from their native homes and brought to this island to be sold like animals and here forced to delve under the merciless lash. Most of the labor of land culture and mechanics, all the household drudgery, as well as the attendance upon arrogant lords and ladies, and the office work of the government, was performed in those days by slaves; and Chios was no exception.

Like Achæos, Cleon, Athenion and Spartacus, the desperate young man broke his bonds by some violent effort. It may have been the immediate result of a quarrel with his master or his overseer, or perhaps a conspiracy of a handful of fellow bondsmen as in the case of Athenion or Spartacus; perhaps a stampede after a battle with clubs and butcher-knives. One thing we know upon such points in general: masters were on the alert at all times, having little confidence in their human chattels, and kept them under guard, often chained at night and in many places, branded.

When Drimakos arrived in the mountains with his band of runaways, he found in the clefts of rock and among the sun-warmed ledges, suitable fastnesses wherein not only to hide in safety but to sleep, and obtain repose. Hunters and other mountaineers had been there before them and built an occasional cabin. With the rocks and fragments they erected more, and with axes and perhaps saws and other tools, covered them and constructed for themselves rough seats and tables. But food was only to be had in the granaries and houses below, in the richly cultivated valleys, and in the distant city they had left.

Here the masters were up in arms, ready for an expedition in pursuit of their escaped bondsmen. The word went vigorously forth that they must be retaken, either dead or alive. On the other hand while preparations were making for a grand pursuit, other slaves took flight and centered to the mountain fissures of Drimakos, now their acknowledged leader.

How they got their first supply of provisions we are unaware, but they certainly did not starve. The same question might in the absence of these particulars also be asked as to how they were supplied with arms with which to do battle with their pursuers. What we know is that they were the recipients of good luck; partly through their own courage and partly through a combination of circumstances which favored them from the start.

The whole truth is, they, like Eunus and the smiling goddess Demeter, or Spartacus and his fortune-telling wife, who foretold prodigies of happiness, had also their Messiah, soothsayer, prophet and warrior in the person of Drimakos, whom they implicitly obeyed and worshiped with a superstitious awe; and so long as the enthusiasm of this belief in him as a Savior remained untarnished, their heaven-inspired dash and valor were insurmountable and their prowess was unscathed. Moreover there prevailed a superstition among the slave-owning Chians themselves, against slavery and especially this class of slave-holding practiced on the island of Chios. In proof of this we quote from Athenæus the following:

"Nymphodorus, it is thus seen, has furnished us with the account; but I find that in many copies of his history Drimakos is not spoken of by name. Yet I cannot imagine that any of you are ignorant of what Herodotus, that prince of historians, said regarding the Chian, Panionios, and what righteous punishment he underwent for having castrated three boys and sold them.' Then again Nicol-

⁷ Herodotus, Historion, viii. Urania, 105-106. The horrible story of revenge is thus told by Herodotus and tersely illustrates the almost inconceivable brutality and cruelty of slavery or of the greed which inspired it. "Εκ τουτέων δὲ Πηδασέων ὁ Ἑρμότιμος ἦν· τῷ μεγίστῃ τίσις ἤδη ἀδικηθέντι ἐγένετο πάντων τῶν ἡμεῖς ἴδμεν. ἀλόντα γὰρ αὐτὸν ὑπὸ πολεμίων καὶ πωλεόμενον ὠνέεται Πανιώνιος, ἀνὴρ Χίος, ὃς τὴν ζόην κατεστήσατο ἀπ' ἔργων ἀνοσιωτάτων. ὅπως γὰρ κτήσαιο παῖδας εἰδεὸς ἐπαμμένους, ἐκτάμνων, ἀγνέων ἐπώλεε ἐς Σάρδεις τε καὶ Ἐφεσον χρημάτων μεγάλων. παρὰ γὰρ τοῖσι βαρβάροισι τιμιώτεροί εἰσι οἱ εὐνούχοι πιστίος εἵνεκα τῆς πάσης τῶν ἐνορχίων. ἄλλους τε δὴ ὁ Πανιώνιος ἐξέταμε πολλοὺς, ἅτε ποιεύμενος ἐκ τουτέων τὴν ζόην, καὶ δὴ καὶ τοῦτον. καὶ οὐ γὰρ τὰ πάντα ἐδυστύχεε ὁ Ἑρμότιμος, ἀπικνέεται ἐκ τῶν Σαρδίων παρὰ βασιλῆα μετ' ἄλλων δώρων· χρόνον δὲ προϊόντος πάντων τῶν εὐνούχων ἐτιμήφῃ μάλιστα παρὰ Πέρσῃ. 106. Ὡς δὲ τὸ στράτευμα τὸ Περσικὸν ὄμοα ὁ βασιλεὺς ἐπὶ τὰς Ἀθήνας ἔων ἐν Σάρδισι, ἐνθαῦτα καταβάς κατὰ δὴ

aus the peripatetic as well as Poseidonius the stoic both wrote in their histories that the Chians were afterwards enslaved by Methridates, tyrant of Cappadocia, and bound hand and foot, were given over to their own slaves. Surely the gods were angry with the Chians."⁸

Nor was this superstition against all kinds of chattel slavery confined to the island of Chios. The people of Attica and different parts of Greece were tormented with conscience on account of their unjust system of slavery and the ever-recurring revolts of their slaves; and the Lockrians, who never tolerated slavery, taunted them for their wickedness.⁹ But the revolts of the slaves themselves, and the growing number of the psomokolaphoi or runaways and the consequent loss to their masters, together with the desperate, often bloody deeds of these runaways whetted their sins and inflamed their fears lest the gods should frown upon them as the upholders of this national abomination. Add to all this the further and significant fact that the freedmen all around them were in sympathy with the slaves and were often organized into powerful unions which sometimes even permitted the slaves to membership.¹⁰ Especially was this the case πρῆγμα ὁ Ἑρμότιμος ἐς γῆν τὴν Μυσίην, τὴν Χίοι μὲν νέμονται, Ἀταρνεὺς δὲ καλεῖται, εὐρίσκει τὸν Πανιώνιον ἐνθαῦτα. ἐπιγνοὺς δὲ ἔλεγε πρὸς αὐτὸν πολλοὺς καὶ φιλίους λόγους· πρῶτα μὲν οἱ καταλέγων ὅσα αὐτὸς δι' ἐκείνον ἔχοι ἀγαθὰ· δεῦτερα δὲ οἱ ὑπισχνεύμενος ἀντὶ τούτων ὅσα μιν ἀγαθὰ ποιήσει, ἣν κομισάμενος τοὺς οἰκέτας οἰκὴν ἐκείνην· ὥστε ὑποδεξάμενον ἄσμενον τοὺς λόγους τὸν Πανιώνιον κομίσαι τὰ τέκνα καὶ τὴν γυναῖκα· ὡς δὲ ἄρα πανοικίῃ μιν περιέλαβε, ἔλεγε ὁ Ἑρμότιμος τάδε· "Ὁ πάντων ἀνδρῶν ἤδη μάλιστα ἀπ' ἔργων ἀνοσιωτάτων τὸν βίον κτησάμενε, τί σὲ ἐγὼ κακὸν ἢ αὐτὸς ἢ τῶν ἐμῶν τις ἐργάσατο, ἢ σὲ, ἢ τῶν σῶν τινα, ὅτι με ἀντ' ἀνδρὸς ἐποίησας τὸ μηδὲν εἶναι; ἐδόκεές τε θεοὺς λήσειν οἷα ἐμπχανῶ τότε· οἱ σε ποιήσαντα ἀνόσια, νόμφ δικάϊφ χρεωμενοί, ὑπήγαγον ἐς χέρας τὰς ἐράς, ὥστε σε μὴ μέμψασθαι τὴν ἀπ' ἐμέο τοι ἐσομένην δίκην." Ὡς δὲ οἱ ταῦτα ὠνείδισε, ἀχθέντων τῶν παιδῶν ἐς ὄψιν, ἠναγκάζετο ὁ Πανιώνιος τῶν ἐωντοῦ παιδῶν τεσσέρων ἐόντων τὰ αἰδοῖα ἀποτάμνειν· ἀναγκαζόμενος δὲ ἐποίησε ταῦτα· αὐτοῦ τε, ὡς ταῦτα ἐργάσατο, οἱ παῖδες ἀναγκαζόμενοι ἀπέταμνον. Πανιώνιον μὲν νυν οὕτω περιήλθε ἢ τε τίσις καὶ ὁ Ἑρμότιμος·

⁸ Athenæus Deipnosophistæ, Lib. VI. cap. vii.

⁹ Athenæus, idem; Böckh, Public Economy of the Athenians, mentions it.

¹⁰ See Lüders, Die Dionysischen Künstler S. 46-47, also S. 22. We have however given Lüders' views and proof (see p. 98 and note 27) in full in another chapter, q. v. The evidence as to slaves being sometimes members is overwhelming. Foucart, Associations Religieuses Chez Les Grecs, pp. 5-6 says: "Il en était tout autrement pour les thïases et les éranes. Non-seulement ils étaient ouverts aux femmes mais encore les étrangers, les personnes de condition ou d'origine servile y avaient accès. Ce dernier point est d'une grande importance, fort heureusement, les témoignages des monuments épigraphiques sont assez précis pour l'établir avec une entière évidence. Il serait inutile de citer toutes les inscriptions qui en donnent la preuve; j'en ai seulement choisi quelques-unes, pour montrer que cette composition était la même dans les différents pays. Les exemples sont assez nombreux pour qu'il soit permis d'étendre la conclusion aux cas mêmes où la preuve directe fait défaut, et de regarder l'admission des femmes, des étrangers, des affranchis et des esclaves, comme un caractère commun de toutes ces associations." Foucart further shows that freedmen and freed-among the Greek-speaking slaves—far more so than among the Romans—and in these society meetings they all, bondsmen and freedmen alike, under protection of their secret eranos or union, discussed their sufferings and perhaps also concocted their plots of salvation. Thus, from all sources—the inner-consciences, the frowning gods, the slaves' own grievances and the constantly recurring strikes maintained by runaways and bloody battles—greedy capitalists were reminded of this abomination which they were hugging, even in ancient days.

The words of Nymphodorus plainly tell us that in the Island of Chios revolts and escape to the mountains were of common occurrence. His words reproduced in the banquet of the learned by Athenæus make the matter plain. We give them below in a note from the old scholiast latin version of 1557, as they introduce the story in plain words.¹¹ The reader is now fully prepared by this description of the surroundings to comprehend the story of Drimakos whom we left in the mountains with his followers, busily at work with saws and axes building rough cabins and meditating a desperate swoop upon the city they had left, that they might seize a part of the grain and stores which their own former labor and that of their fellow bondsmen had created. This expedition was well planned. Of this we have assurance in the words of woman got their freedom many times through their organization. Under the head "Affranchis ou esclaves," p. 7, he cites inscriptions whose epigraphs clearly explain that slaves were members in Rhodes. We have elsewhere shown that the ancient states owned slaves. They were known as public servants. "Une inscription de l'île de Rhodes mentionne une société religieuse composée des esclaves publics de la ville (voyez p. 112, note 4). La mutilation du monument enlève à ce témoignage une partie de sa valeur. Mais l'examen des noms propres qui se rencontrent dans les autres inscriptions prouve que ces associations admettaient les affranchis et probablement même les esclaves." On page 112, cited by Foucart occur the words: "Un fragment d'inscription, restitué par Keil d'une manière hardie, mais, à tout prendre, vraisemblable, montrerait la composition particulière de la société qui se plaçait sous le patronage de Zeus Atabyrios. Elle aurait été formée des esclaves publics de la ville de Rhodes, et c'est l'un d'eux qui aurait exercé le sacerdoce. Ὑπὲρ Διοσταθυρίας τῶν τὰς πόλιος δούλων, Εὐαί. .ενος γραμματεὺς δαμόσιος ἱερατεύσας Διὸς Ἀταθυρίου . . . τῶν κυρίων Ῥοδίων ἀνέθηκε Διὶ Ἀταθυρίῳ . . . Philologus, 2d suppl., p. 612." It seems exceedingly strange that this learned author should lack the power of penetration so far as to continually make a hack of a pet idiosyncrasy regarding these innumerable organizations having been strictly religious orders. The fact is, as we continually show, braced also by epigraphists like Mommsen and Böckh that they were bona fide labor societies compelled under vigorous laws to cover their real object with the shield of the Pagan faith.

¹¹ "Haec igitur de illis scripsit Nymphodorus in Asiæ Navigatione. Chlorum servi ab ipsis dominis aufugientes in montes sublimioraque, ipsorum devastantes multi simul coacti sunt. Est enim ipsa insula aspera multisque arboribus referta." Athenæus, VI., chap. vii., (Natalis de Comisibus, Veneto, 1556).

Athenæus who says that Drimakos was not really the aggressor but that the Chians sent an expedition into the fugitives' retreat, and that the latter being favored and well generaled, came off victorious. This means that the Chians were decoyed into ambush by Drimakos, attacked, cut to pieces, their arms captured and the slaves left complete masters of the field. In other words, there was fought a bloody battle, even a succession of battles, and of such terrible cruelty that even the heart of the stern Drimakos was melted with sympathy and he soon sought a council of arbitration to put a stop to the ruthless effusion of blood. But this did not occur until sometime after the first decisive contest with the masters was fought.

When, by this and other victories, the slaves found themselves in full possession of their caverns, and their new home supplied with provisions, their soldiers with arms captured from the defeated masters, and their numbers much augmented by incoming detachments of runaways from all parts of the island, they began to think of discipline and order. Drimakos was made king, commander-in-chief and despot; and he began to exercise an iron rule over his subjects nearly as severe, but more just than that of their former masters.¹² Having vanquished the armies of the masters in repeated and bloody battles, causing a state of things which may have lasted for years—since both the duration and dates are forgotten by our historian—the slaves continued to get their provisions from the granaries, barns, farms and stores, in the following extraordinary manner:

A council or conference was called by this victorious man of the mountains, whereat the Chian masters were invited to participate with him and his victorious legions on equal terms, under a flag of truce. When the generals and magistrates of the city and the rebels met, king Drimakos made a speech which contained a covenant of arbitration, perhaps unheard of before or since. We give the substance of his proposition in his own words, in order to show that singular examples of co-operation and arbitration have been tried in the remote past:

¹² The latin version Athen. VI. chap. viii. Natal. de Com. Ven. 1556. tells it in these words: "Paulo ante nostra tempora famulum quendam, narrant ipsi Chii, profugisse atque in ipsis montibus habitasse, qui cum esset bellicosus animoque virili fugitivorum fervorum Dux ac imperator declaratus erat, non aliter atque reges solet exercitus cum sepius postea Chii copias in eum eduxissent, nihilque facere possent, ubi eos Primacus (sic enim servus nominatur) frustra interior conspexit, sic ad illos locutus est." The gist of his speech we give in full, Vide Supra.

"An oracle has been consulted and our revolt has, from the start, been upheld by the gods. We shall never lay down our arms. We shall never again submit to the drudgery of bondage. We are fixed in our own minds and act under counsel of the Almighty. Nevertheless if you follow my advice and adhere to it in the strictest faith, after signing this pledge and contract, the war may be terminated and the further effusion of blood dispensed with; then we can mutually live in peace and enjoy tranquility on terms which will be full of prosperity to the whole state of which we all are members."

The Chians who had been humbled by their defeats and losses consented to an armistice of war, thus recognizing for the slaves the dignity of a public enemy. They found it a convenience, doubtless against their will, to submit to propositions of reason. Drimakos then explained his plan:

"What we want is enough to subsist upon;—no more. In future, when hunger and need inspire us, we shall visit your granaries, flocks and stores and take what we require but always by weight and measure. The weights and measures are to be these which we have brought you and exhibit before your eyes. Here also is a signet¹⁸ with which we propose to seal up your storehouses and granaries after taking from them what we require, as by this means you will be able to distinguish our work from that of common robbers. Regarding the slaves who in future shall escape from you to our camp, I shall rigidly investigate the causes of each man's running away, weigh his story carefully, and after submitting his case to an unbiased examination, if he be found to have suffered injustice at your hand, proving that he has been treated wrongly by you, I shall protect him. If on the contrary, the runaway slave be found not to have had a sufficient cause, I shall return him to his master."

Drimakos, it is seen, thus recognized and upheld slavery as an institution, only punishing its abuses. This fact corresponds with the ancient opinion that slavery was right; a thing not at all to be wondered at, considering the prevalence of this aged institution and the inculcation of the competitive system through its massive religious and political machinery, based upon an unscrupulous ownership alike of men and things, by the ancient law of entailment and primogeniture. We do not find that the slave system was ever publicly and boldly and philosophically denounced as an institution. But it is certain that it was fought in the secret unions and communes until Jesus daringly came out in open discourse against it and founded Christianity upon the new basis of absolute equality of man, which was essentially, as the results have proved, a revolution or upturning of the entire system of paganism and its heathenish discrimination between the grandee and his human chattels; and to him must be ascribed the authorship of the idea of unconditional emancipation. But while Drimakos could not unscrupulously war with slavery as an institution his course is exactly in line with the great movement of his day which in other chapters we are describing¹⁴ in these arguments. He betrays himself in the foregoing speech to have been, like Eunus, a soothsayer, or prophet, or Messiah, such as the innumerable sodalicia and thiasoi, or labor unions everywhere possessed.¹⁵ He, like Spartacus, Blossius, Eunus, and the rest, was infused with this strange, everywhere-prevailing idea of some Messiah coming to the redemption of the poor slave. All the slave runaways were superstitious, and used in good faith and in harmonious consistency with their creed, this nympholepsy of the Messiah, long before the real Messiah came.¹⁶

¹⁸ By the word used in Athensæus meaning signet or seal we are probably to understand a contrivance of some kind for locking up the store-houses and granaries—locks and keys.

These conditions of Drimakos were readily agreed to by the Chian capitalists, who were not in a condition to refuse. In consequence, so soon as the stipulations were formally signed they went into effect and the slave-king for many years had only to send his troops boldly and openly on their strange marauding adventures, always taking quantities by weight and measure as agreed upon, and always locking up the storehouses and granaries when they left them. The result was a mercy to the whole island which had been hitherto infested with robbers. It is not stated, but left to be inferred from the sequel, that Drimakos drove all other robbers from the island; for we know that his armed force, now legalized, acted as a sort of police to the whole personality and property of the people, slaves included. He adhered with severity to the stipulation of the agreement and when runaways appeared to him for protection he instituted a strict investigation of their case; those not having been maltreated being always sent back to their owners. This of course had the effect to cause masters to treat their slaves with kindness and never to overwork or otherwise abuse them, lest they incur the terrible wrath of the god-favored umpire seated on his throne among the crags and eagles-nests of the mountains. On the other hand the would-be runaways were surer to reflect cautiously before making the attempt, being in deadly fear at the just judgment of the despot before whom they were to be arraigned for trial immediately after their suit before him for protection. Thus the revolted slave became not only an absolute ruler, king and general-in-chief of the slave population, but also, in some respects, a judge in a court of justice with a standing army at command to enforce his decisions—an umpire over the whole population, bond and free.

¹⁴ See chapter xxii and elsewhere, on Trade Unions which adduces proof that the freedmen arose out of slavery through their own efforts and argued up the idea from their own narrower basis.

¹⁵ Consult Lüdgers, Die Dionysischen Künstler, Foucart, Associations Religieuses for the Greek, and Mommsen, de Collegiis et Sodalitiis Romanorum for the latin unions, passim.

¹⁶ See Bücher, Aufst. d. unf. Arb. S. 79.

Years rolled by and Drimakos felt old age approaching, yet did not flinch from what he considered the dignity and honor of his plan of justice. He remained at the helm, punishing or rewarding like a czar, until he was old and feeble and weary of a lengthier existence. He had a friend in the person of a young man, also a psomokolophos or runaway, who probably deserved this appellation for being pliant and perhaps a little parasitical and given to the recipiency of tit-bits in payment for flatteries ingeniously brought to the old man's ear. He, like many of the other slaves, was a native of a distant land, having when very young been kidnapped or taken a prisoner of war, and as a victim to the vicious slave-trade, sold to the planters of Chios. He was one of those young fugitive slaves who had proved his grievance under the investigation, been accepted, retained and trusted. Drimakos loved him and confided in his youthful honesty.

Meantime the Chians, unsatisfied with what they regarded as their burden, offered a large reward in gold to whomsoever should bring them the head of Drimakos. This they did against their true interests; since at that moment while under the eagle-eyed justice of this weird old judge in the mountain cliffs, their true interests were being more reasonably and economically subserved than ever before or afterwards, as the sequel of this story bears record. Perhaps the old man in his peevishness was grieved by their ingratitude in offering a bounty on his head. At any rate, we are told that he grew weary of his hoary hairs and enfeebling senectitude, and resolved that the ungrateful masters should pay the bounty and take the consequences whether of pleasure or of regret. In other words he resolved to send them his head and make it bring its price in gold!

In our own days of comparative sympathies and sensibilities a resolution like this could scarcely emanate from any person other than a madman; and our first judgment, shocked at the bare conception, is that no horror so appalling could have been devised by anything saner than some idiocracy of an errant brain. But 2,000 years have softened the human mind which, though yet cruel and sometimes even savage, is so comparatively tender that it pronely misjudges the motives and the drastic will which impelled some acts of our progenitors.

Drimakos resolved to shuffle off his mortal coil. Calling to him the friend whose name our informants have not transmitted to us, he spoke to him in the following characteristic words:

"Boy, I have brought thee up nearest to me, ever with the emotions of confidence and love more than that felt for all others of mankind. Thou art child and son and all that to me is dear. I have lived out my span. I have lived long enough; but thou art still young and hast blood and hope and sprightliness, and there is much before thee. Thou shalt become a good and brave man.

Son, the city of the Chians is offering to him that bringeth them my head a sum of money and promising him his freedom. Therefore thy duty is to cut off my head, take it to them, receive thy reward, return home to thy fatherland and be happy."

The innocent youth at the thought of such an ungrateful and sickening atrocity, refused for the first time to obey his benefactor, and struggled hard to change the old man's determination, but in vain. Having resolved, he was inexorable. When the youth found him fixed in his horrible resolution and knew by long acquaintance with him that it was unalterable, he allowed himself to be persuaded.

The slave-king laid his head upon the block and the youth cleft it with the axe of the executioner!

Having buried the body of his friend and patron, the youth took the head to the city, received its price, his freedom and an amnesty and departed for his home with wealth and distinction.

The Chians did not long rejoice over their boasted capture of the head of the land-pirate. Soon after he was dead the runaway slaves with whom the rocks and forests of that rugged country were infested, being no longer under the restraint of the ever vigilant Drimakos, returned to their wonted habits of pillage by land and piracy by sea. The Chians were poignantly reminded of the error they had committed in their harsh measures against the powerful but just chieftain, who, for many years had held the discontented and warlike freebooters under control. The fugitive slaves re-began their work of robbery and devastation. Readopting their former habits of plunder based on revenge as well as want, they ceased to be an organized body following a stipulated arrangement like that which so long had existed between Drimakos and the Chian people, and became a desperate gang of land pirates and outlaws.

The treachery of the Chians in securing the removal of Drimakos thus recoiled upon themselves in shape of a calamity. They remembered the prophetic words of the martyred chieftain, that the gods had espoused the cause of the poor slaves and were angry with their masters. A feeling remembrance, kindling a high degree of respect for him now set in, and both combined to produce a veneration which caused them to erect a tomb or mausoleum over his grave, which the Greeks called a heroon, and he became the object of hero worship. This was no less a structure than a temple dedicated to Drimakos, the now deified hero.

Such was the sublimity of the subject that this heroon or temple arose so splendid and enduring that its ruins¹⁷ remain to this day and have been the object of study by archæologists and other students from more than a dozen points of view.¹⁸ The superstitions of the times now came in play in the flexible imaginations of these people. They persuaded themselves that they often saw in the gloom of night the ghost of Drimakos, now as before their friend, as, bony-fingered and spectral, it appeared to warn the Chians of some foul plot his fellow runaways and brigands were concocting against their lives and property. And many a time were the lurking filibusters thus checkmated in their manœuvres, ambuscades and sallies, and many a time defeated in their bloody designs by the wan and stalking ghost of Drimakos. Curiously enough this superstition was mutual between bond and free; for the brigands themselves worshipped the manes of Drimakos as their hero also; and always first brought to his mausoleum the richest trophies of their marauding expeditions before dispersing to their caverns with the rest.

So weird and romantic does this tale of the wild men of ancient Scio sound that we have hesitated before allowing it to contribute its enriching lessons and charms, lest it prove unable to bear the criticism of our learned but skeptic readers. But when our eye at last caught the smiling assurances of its trustworthiness from savants like Dr. Karl Bücher, and other learned teachers of philology, and from their pen we obtained the bracing words that not the slightest doubt¹⁹ exists as to the credibility of the story, we ventured to bring it forth upon its merits as another instance of labor's hardships and struggles for existence.

¹⁷ Consult Stark bei Hermann. S. 40, 16.

¹⁸ See Ross Travels in the Islands; Inscription de Scio, No. 72.

¹⁹ Bücher Aufstände der Unfreien Arbeiter, S. 28. "Mag man einzelne Züge dieser Geschichte romanhaft finden, es bietet sich auch nicht der leiseste Grund, an ihrer Echtheit zu zweifeln, und selbst wenn die klugen chioschen Kaufleute sie zur Erklärung des Heroöns und als Abschreckungsmittel für ihre Sklaven erfunden hätten, bliebe sie darum weniger ein treues Spiegelbild vorhandener Zustände."

CHAPTER VIII.

VIRIATHUS.

A GREAT REBELLION IN SPAIN.

THE Roman Slave System in Spain—Tyranny in Lusitania—Massacre of the People—Condition before the Outbreak—First Appearance of Viriathus—A Shepherd on his Native Hills—A Giant in Stature and Intellect—He takes Command—Vetillius Outwitted—Captured and Slain—Conflict in Tartessus—Romans again Beaten—Battle of the Hill of Venus—Viriathus Slaughters another army and Humiliates Rome—Segobria Captured—Arrival of Amilianus—He is Out-generaled and at last Beaten by Viriathus—More Battles and Victories for the Farmers—Arrival of Plautius with Fresh Roman Soldiers—Viriathus made King—More Victories—Treason, Conspiracy and Treachery Lurking in his Camps—Murdered by his own Perfidious Officers—Pomp at His Funeral—Relentless Vengeance of the Romans—Crucifixion and worse Slavery than before—The Cause Lost.

The successful issue to Rome, of the third Punic war by which Carthage, agreeably to the inveterate apothegm of Cato: "delenda est Carthago," the land of the terrible Hannibal was chopped to pieces and its inhabitants butchered or sold into slavery, caused an enormous amount of suffering to the human race.

Not only did the spirit of greed cause Roman land speculators to press the enforcement of the slave laws which seized prisoners and consigned them to the most cruel wholesale bondage in Asia-Minor, Italy and Sicily, but it extended this mischief, also into sunny Spain.

One of the main causes of the rebellion of inner emotions of the celebrated Tiberius Gracchus against Rome, goading him to become the champion of a reform in favor of the poor, was the wretchedly enslaved condition of the working people in all countries under Roman domination. Their terrible condition in Etruria was no worse than in Numantia in Spain. He had seen the indescribable suffering at Carthage, when nearly the entire population were either put to the sword or sold in slavery. Spain was on the verge of rebellion everywhere. Roman conquest had but a few years before, stricken Epirus a fruitful land eastward from Italy. Paulus Æmilius tore from the farmers of this region upwards of £2,000,000 of their savings in gold, and after the battle of Pydna, seized no less than 150,000 people by order of the Roman Senate. These people, nearly all farmers and other workers, were dragged from their homes and sold for slaves. Seventy cities were sacked and destroyed.

Towns, villages, cities on every side, as well as farms and small industries, with their unions and communes, were reduced to a desolate waste, and the people, who were still alive, whether suffering under the lash of masters in a foreign land, or gasping under tyranny at home, were burning with bitterness, revengefulness, hatred and other lurking passions, and sinking into degeneracy, recklessness and poverty.

Such was also the miserable status of affairs in Spain in the year B. C. 149, when our story of Viriathus begins. Old Lusitania before the Roman conquests, was a populous and enterprising country. There were associations, of the Lusitanian laboring people, which under some favorable rules had existed so long that they had become rich. Traces of their enterprise are still to be seen in form of temples, bridges and roads. It appears to have been in their days of highest glory that Rome, with a blackening curse of human slavery, struck this beautiful, sunny clime and its contented, happy and prosperous people.

Our story begins with a perfidious piece of treachery of one Servius Sulpicius Galba, who commanded the Roman army of invasion in Spain. Like Verres in Sicily, Galba seemed to have no moral respect for humanity. He worked his plans to secure the confidence of these people and when the opportunity arrived, perfidiously murdered them in great numbers, seized and dragged others into slavery and robbed their country of its gold with which he afterwards, in spite of old Cato's efforts to have him punished, bought himself free from the sentence of the law at Rome. Soon after these outrages of Galba, Rome withdrew many of the soldiers from Spain and the people rallied with greater determination than ever, to retrieve their losses. They were mostly farmers and mechanics, and men of strong, well established principles.

Among those who had the fortune to escape from the last massacre of Galba was a young man named Viriathus. He is represented by Diodorus as almost a giant in stature² and a person born to command. He was endowed by nature with the rare faculties of honor and truthfulness, while at the same time leading the life of a hunter, a shepherd and finally of a border warrior in defense of himself and his kindred. An excellent description of Viriathus is left us by Diodorus in a short fragment of his histories which have been fortunately preserved. This fragment, while it represents him to have been a robber, extols at the same breath his honor for distributing the plunder among his men.³ Livy speaks of him as a man of warlike qualifications, having had experience as a mountaineer.⁴

The charge against him, of being a lawless bandit is no longer maintained by authors, since the circumstances under which he careered, show of themselves, that he did nothing which any patriot would not be bound to do in defense of home, family and friends. What the ancient authors seem to be prejudiced against him for, is the fact that, like Athenion and Spartacus, he was poor and that he belonged to the lowly and strictly laboring class. But even with the excusable charge against him that he was a robber, we find very few who do not speak highly of him as a great leader and a man of uncommon justice.

² Diodorus, Bibliotheca Historica, lib. XXXIII. Eclog. V. of fragments: "Οὐριάτθου κυρήσαντες, μεγάλα Ῥωμαίους ἐβλάψαν. ἦν μὲν οὖν οὗτος τῶν παρὰ τὸν ὠκεανὸν οἰκούντων Λυσιτανῶν, ποιμαίνων ἐκ παιδός, ὁρεῖα βίῃ κατέστη συνήθης, συνεργὸν ἔχων καὶ τὴν τοῦ σώματος φύσιν· καὶ γὰρ ῥώμη, καὶ τάχει, καὶ τῇ τῶν λοιπῶν μερῶν εὐκίνησίῃ, πολὺ διήνεγκε τῶν Ἰβήρων. συνείθισε δὲ αὐτὸν τροφῇ μὲν ὀλίγῃ, γυμνασίοις δὲ πολλοῖς χρῆσθαι, καὶ ὕπνῳ μέχρι μόνου τοῦ ἀναγκαίου. καθόλου δὲ σιδηροφορῶν συνεχῶς, καὶ λησταῖς εἰς ἀγῶνας καθιστάμενος, περιβόητος ἐγένετο παρὰ τοῖς πλήθεσι, καὶ ἡγεμὼν αὐτοῖς ᾤρέθη, καὶ ταχὺ σύστημα περὶ ἑαυτὸν ληστῶν ἤθροισε. καὶ προκόπτων ἐν τοῖς πολέμοις, οὐ μόνον ἐθαυμαστώθη δι' ἀλκὴν, ἀλλὰ καὶ στρατηγεῖν ἔδοξε διαφερόντως."

³ Idem, Excerpt de Virt. et Vit. pag. 591: "Ὅτι Οὐριάτθος ὁ λῆσταρχος ὁ Λυσιτανὸς καὶ δίκαιος ἦν ἐν ταῖς διανοαῖς τῶν λαφύρων, καὶ κατ' ἀξίαν τιμῶν τοὺς ἀνδραγαθήσαντας ἐξαιρέτοις δώροις, ἐτι δὲ οὐδὲν ἀπλῶς ἐκ τῶν κοινῶν νοσφίζμενος. διὸ καὶ συνέβαινε τοὺς Λυσιτανοὺς προθυμότερα συγκινδυνεύειν αὐτῷ, τιμῶντας οἰονεῖ τινα κοινὸν εὐεργέτην καὶ σωτῆρα."

⁴ Livy, Epitom. of Historiarum, Libri, LII. "Viriathus in Hispania primum ex pastore venator, ex venatore latro, mox justī quoque exercitus dux factus, totam Lusitaniam occupavit."

The only thing Galba and Lucullus seem to have been able to think of, when sent from Rome into Spain, was to plunder at an unlimited cost of suffering and blood. Cheating, deceiving, working deeds of treachery against the people and amassing gold was their single object; and to get the gold from Spain and carry it as their own personal property to Rome, was their bent and determination.⁶

Among the few Lusitanians who escaped from the last massacre of Galba, was Viriathus. He adroitly forewarned himself and a few friends, of a treacherous plot, just at the moment of its consummation and with difficulty extricated himself, although great numbers of innocent people were murdered or enslaved. His opportunity was now at hand, and he informed the shattered remnant of the band, of which it appears he was at the time, little above the rank and file, that if they would entrust the future command of their forces to him, he would lead them out in safety. In a speech he told them that they were too confiding; that the Romans were utterly devoid of all instincts of truthfulness or honor, and that the only tactics in future to be pursued must be based upon the idea of treating them as enemies; that whatever the hypocritical pretence of either the Roman senate, or its inhuman emissaries that Spain was in need of protection, the truth at the bottom was, that Rome wanted the whole of this fair and fruitful land, its productive mines, its waving grain fields, its fisheries, timber forests and gems, for her great lords; and she only wanted these inestimable resources worked for such arrogant darlings of her aristocracy, not by free labor but by that of slaves, subjugated through plots and systematized perfidy. Give me, said Viriathus, the unlimited command of your brave warriors and I will rid the land of our fathers of these mortal foes.

⁶ Appian, Iberia, 60: Livy, Epitome, XLIX. remarks that Cato was stern enough to have Galba punished but the trial came to naught: the infamous traitor had too much gold at command: "Quum L. Scribonius tribunus plebis rogationem promulgasset, ut Lusitani, qui, in fidem populi Romani dediti, a Ser. Galba in Galliam venissent, in libertatem restituerentur, M. Cato acerrime sensit. Exstat oratio in Annalibus eius inclusa. Q. Fulvius Nobilior, et saepe ab eo in senatu laceratus, respondit pro Galba. Ipse quoque Galba, quum se damnari viderit, complexus duos filios praetextatos, et Sulpicii Galli filium, cuius tutor erat, ita miserabiliter pro se locutus est, ut rogatio antiquaretur."

The speech won the distinguished sympathy of the governors. The tall mountaineer received the full command of the army; and now begins one of the most remarkable series of successes, wrought amid difficulties, cruelties and transient triumphs, to be found in the history of Rome. These extraordinary contests lasted, according to various authors from eight to twenty years.*

After the departure to Rome of Galba and Lucullus, with their gold, a prætor or governor, named Gaius Vetilius was entrusted by the Romans, with the care of the Spanish possessions; and Viriathus thus left the flocks under his care in the mountains and valleys of his home to take permanent charge of the broken and disheartened army which had regained some spirit, however, on account of the evacuation of their territory by Galba, and began marching down into the fertile valleys of Turdetania.

Vetilius met them promptly, and before the new commander could organize his troops, or perhaps before he really got command, gained a victory, driving them back and forced them to agree to, and almost conclude an unconditional surrender. This was perhaps the auspicious

* We here give the several authorities for the duration of these wars, from the massacres of Galba to the assassination of Viriathus consecutively as follows:

Appian, Historia Romana, Iberia, 68, put it at about 8 years: "Ὁ δὲ ἐς ὀκτὲς ἐτη Ῥωμαίοις ἐπὶ δέκα καὶ μοι δοκεῖ τὸν Οὐριάθην πόλεμον, σφόδρα τε ἐνοχλήσαντα Ῥωμαίοις καὶ δυσεργότατον αὐτοῖς γενόμενον, συναγαγεῖν, ἀναδόμενον εἰ τι τοῦ αὐτοῦ χρόνου περὶ Ἰσπανίαν ἄλλο ἐγένετο."

Livy, Historiarum, Liber, LII. Epitom. "C. Vetillum prætorem, fuso eius exercitu, cepit; post quem C. Plautius prætor nihil felicitus rem gessit: tantumque terroris in hostis intulit, ut adversus eum consulari opus esset et duce, et exercitu." This mention is found by a careful study of the different commands, to make the duration to have been about 14 years.

Justin, XLIV. 2, says 10 years; while Diodorus, makes it to appear about 11 years, and Orosius, Historiæ Adversus Paganos, V. 4, about 8 to 10 years.

Eutrope, Breviarium Rerum Romanarum, IV. 16, evidently takes his statement from Livy; for aside from putting the wars of Viriathus at 14 years, he uses almost the same language in describing the man: "Quo metu Viriathus a suis interfectus est, cum quatuordecim annis Hispanias adversum Romanos movisset. Pastor primo fuit, mox latronum dux, postremo tantos ad bellum populos concitavit, ut assertor contra Romanos Hispaniæ putaretur."

Vallejus Paterculus, Breviarium Historiæ Romanæ, lib. II. cap. 90, declares the duration of the wars with Viriathus to have been 20 years, and undoubtedly Mommsen in putting it at 8 with Appian, is entirely wrong.

moment at which Viriathus first showed himself and made his speech, as we have just recounted.

This hardy Spaniard, on getting the reins firmly into his hands, introduced a method of tactics little understood or anticipated by the Romans. He made an unexpected revolt against the stipulations of capitulation then being drawn up, accompanying the same with a dash of his troops, and by a series of twists and turns in which the swiftest of the Spanish cavalry were brought into play, succeeded in extricating the little army so entirely from the grasp of Vetilius that he effected a retreat into a rocky woodland, and there safely spent the night in rest and needed refreshment, and the following day in religious purifications according to the Spanish creed.⁷ The flight, according to Appian, and others, was accomplished by dividing the army into several parts, each under the command of a trusted leader, with orders to reunite at a given point, and with 1,000 horses under his own command he covered their retreat, first galloping to the rescue of one and then the other. In this manner they all reached Tribola in safety, after holding their pursuers in check for two days by means of various expedients of consummate ingenuity in which he took advantage of the wild and rugged shape of the land.⁸

All this time he was marching southward toward the strait of Gades, to the ancient Carteia. Vetilius could ill brook the escape of his game which so short a time before he believed to be in his hand. He made a desperate effort to frustrate the splendid retreat of the Spanish army, but Viriathus decoyed him into an ambush at the foot of the Hill of Venus where a celebrated battle was fought, which Appian and others graphically describe.⁹

It was a deep gorge, thick-set with briars, rocks, forest trees and other obstructions, which puzzled the best army

⁷ Appian, Historia Romana, Hispania, 62; Frontin, Strategematon, lib. III, xl. § 4: "Viriathus, cum trepiduliter discedens confecisset, idem illud uno die remensis securos Segobrigenses et sacrificio cum maxime occupatos oppressit."

⁸ Appian, 62, 20-25; of Mendelssohn: "Ὡς δ' εἰκασεν ἀσφαλῶς εἶχειν τῆς φυγῆς τοὺς ἐτέρους, τότε νυκτὸς ὁρμήσας δι' ὁδῶν ἀτριβῶν κουφοτάτοις ἵπποις ἀπέδραμεν ἐς Τρίβόλαν, Ῥωμαίων αὐτὸν διώκειν ὁμοίως οὐ δυναμένων διὰ τοῦ βάρους ὅπλων καὶ ἀπειρίας ὁδῶν καὶ ἵππων ἀνεμοιόγητα."

⁹ Consult also Dion Cassius, Historiae, LXXVIII. p. 88, Wess.; Frontin, Strategematon, lib. III. cap. 10; refers to this as one of the great strokes of strategy: "Viriathus disposito per occulta milite paucos misit, qui abigerent pecora Segobrigensium: ad quae illi vindicanda cum frequentes procurriscent simultantesque fugam praedatores persequerentur, deducti in insidias caesi sunt."

unaccustomed to mountain life but which least tormented a man like Viriathus, whose life had been that of a hunter and shepherd among glens and precipices.¹⁰ It was about the time when Viriathus, after his three days retreat, was entering the town of Tribola, that Vetilius and his men made a desperate effort to seize him. Some of the Spanish detachments were out reconnoitring when they were set upon by a heavy body of Romans in the ledge, and after many hours of severe fighting the Romans lost their general and gave way with a loss in killed of about 5,000 soldiers—a half of their entire force. It was soon afterwards discovered that Vetilius had met one of the hardy mountaineers, and in a hand to hand encounter had been taken prisoner by him.¹¹ Most writers agree that the Roman general was mortally wounded in this encounter. It was a great and bloody victory.

Immediately after the triumph of Viriathus at the Hill of Venus, an immense number of slaves and free tramps whose condition was worse than that of slaves, came into the camp from all quarters, to offer themselves as soldiers; and although we do not find much in the fragments of history left us on this rebellion, yet it cannot be doubted that a very large army was called into being; and this was probably the prime secret of the continued train of successes attending the career of the insurgents.

There was another army in Spain, subject to Rome, consisting of Spanish militia and mercenaries, or perhaps freedmen who had been impressed into the Roman service. These, 5,000 strong, on the arrival of the news of the disaster to Vetilius, struck out in a rapid march from their quarters on the river Ebro.

The eye of Viriathus was however on the lookout for them. He marched a large force to waylay, and prevent them from joining the enemy who had by this time so far recovered as to show an army of 16,000 men, now marching toward Gades the old Tartessus. He met them at some convenient place and in a second battle destroyed them so completely that nothing was left of the force worthy of being henceforth considered an auxiliary to the Romans.

¹⁰ Diodorus, Bibliotheca Historica, XXXIII. Eclog. V. "Συνείθισε δὲ αὐτὸν τροφῇ μὲν ὀλίγῃ, γυμνασίοις δὲ πολλοῖς χρῆσθαι, καὶ ὕπνῳ μόνου ἀναγκαίου· καθόλου δὲ σιδηροφόρων συνεχῶς, καὶ θηρίοις καὶ λησταῖς εἰς ἀγῶνας καθιστάμενος, περιβόητος ἐγένετο παρὰ τοῖς πλῆθεσι, καὶ ἡγεμὼν αὐτοῖς ᾗρέθη, καὶ ταχὺ σύστημα περὶ αὐτὸν γηστῶν ἤθροισε."

¹¹ Appian, Historia Romana, idem, 63.

All these manœuvres, victories, and vicissitudes occupied the year; and by the time the Romans were snugly fortifying themselves in Tartessus, news of the defeat of the armies and death of the governor arrived at Rome. Gaius Plautius was dispatched to the scene with a large reinforcement of 13,000 men, consisting of 10,000 foot and 3,000 horse.

But in the meantime, Viriathus was realizing his highest glory socially and politically, among his own people. He redeemed from its bondage, and reoccupied, the whole province of Karpetania; and large as the Roman army was, they dared not make an attempt against him. He was made a king and given powers and position which became princely but not magnificent; for he refused to accept anything but his wonted frugal fare. He only claimed to be an honest shepherd and workingman. They married him to a lady of high estate and wealth but all he would accept was herself, leaving to those who were flattered by gew-gaws, the shallow pleasures of jewels and gold. His only ambition was to divert his natural gifts from a profession of intrinsic value in the field of labor, to that of the military camp, until he should redeem his people from slavery and danger into which they had been forced by the Roman conquests. He was witty and bright, and he surpassed his fellows in physical stature. An indefatigable worker, he always slept in full armor and fought in the front ranks; and even at the moment of highest triumph ever refused to indulge in intemperance of any kind.¹²

After the arrival of Plautius, as prætor or governor from Rome, with the large force of 13,000 men, as we have mentioned, and time had been taken to reorganize the broken remnants stated by Appian to number 16,000 men, an expedition was arranged to bring the daring revolter to punishment. But in the first dash, Viriathus attacked his detachment of 4,000 and almost exterminated them. In a succession of engagements and stratagems Plautius was so completely hacked to pieces that he retired in midsummer into winter quarters, at a safe distance from the now dreaded Spaniard. This disaster to the Roman prætor was so complete that he never recovered from it, and was afterwards driven into exile and disgrace.

¹² Dion Cassius, Histories, LXXVIII. So also, Diodorus, Bibliotheca Romana lib. XXXIII. fragments. All such excellent points of character of the great Lusitanian Chieftain are mentioned by these ancient authors; consult also Bekker, Viriathus und die Lusitaner.

The next general sent out from Rome against Viriathus was the son of Paulus Æmilius, who a few years before had dragged into slavery 150,000 people, after the battle of Pydna, in Epirus. His full name was Quintus Fabius Maximus Æmilianus. He brought with him an army of 15,000 foot soldiers and a cavalry force of 2,000, which added to those already in Spain but now in a demoralized condition must have aggregated a force of little less than 50,000.¹³ Fabius Maximus pitched his camp at Orsona, not far from where the city of Seville now stands, and remained there until the next year, closely watched by Viriathus.

This Roman governor seems to have left the command to a person less capable than himself whose name was Quinctius; for the Spaniard lured him into some conflict which seems to have been deadly. Appian is not clear as to what it was, but speaks of the shrewd manœuvres of Viriathus, and of a battle, the results of which were the loss of many, by hard fighting. The inference is, that both Æmilianus and Quinctius were defeated and destroyed; for we next hear of the arrival from Rome, of another general, Quintus Servilianus, a near relative of the same Æmilius Paulus.

This general brought with him two whole legions and ten elephants from Utica, a town northward from Carthage in Africa. This new force, in addition to the elephants, consisted of 18,000 foot and 1,600 horse.¹⁴ Servilianus had little difficulty in marching with this army through several of the districts which had been reconquered by Viriathus. He took many of the leaders of the rebellion, and had at one time as many as 500 killed for taking part in the revolt. Great numbers were sold into slavery. Those caught, who were found to have turned against the Romans, were cruelly treated by having their hands cut off.

¹³ Appian, Historia Romana, Iberia, 65: "Καὶ παρὰ τῶν συμμάχων στρατὸν ἄλλον αὐτῆς, ἦκεν ἐς Ὀρσωνα τῆς Ἰβηρίας σὺμπαντας ἔχων πεζοὺς μυρία καὶ πεντακισχιλίους καὶ ἱππίας ἐς δις χιλίους."

¹⁴ Appian, Historia Romana, idem, 67: "Ἀπαντας ἐς μυρίου καὶ ὀκτακισχιλίους πεζοὺς καὶ ἱππίας ἑξακοσίους ἐπὶ χιλίους. ἐπιστείλας δὲ καὶ Μικίπην τῷ Νομάδων βασιλεῖ πέμψαι οἱ τάχιστα ἐλέφαντας, ἐς Ἰνύκην ἡπείγετο, τὴν στρατιὰν ἄγων κατὰ μέρος."

At length Viriathus, who was watching his opportunity, caught the old Roman at the siege of the town of Erisane, and after a severe contest defeated him. Driven to a rocky ledge in an angle from which it was impossible to escape, the victorious Spaniards had him completely in their power.

Here, at the zenith of a long list of brilliant successes, virtually closes the glory of Viriathus. He was so foolish as to let his sympathies get the better of his judgment.

So complete was this victory over Servilianus that he was glad to treat on any terms; and the surprising sequel is, that the terms offered by Viriathus and accepted at Rome were so mild. The Spaniard was to be acknowledged king over his native country of Lusitania, and henceforward to be regarded as a brother or ally to the Romans!

Of course this furnished Rome another period of time to recuperate and concoct new schemes of treachery. This she did, by sending the perfidious Cæpio to take the place of Servilianus, and he was not long in bribing the friends of Viriathus to turn against their long trusted master and murder him in his sleep.

An enormous, far-sounding wake accompanied by gladiatorial orgies of shocking ferocity, was held over his remains. The date of this great revolt in Spain is fixed at 149 years before Christ. This disgraceful triumph of Cæpio was followed by the enslavement of innumerable peasants, traders and working people, and the end was worse than the beginning.

If we are to believe Vellejus Paterculus, the great wars of Viriathus against the Roman slave trade—for it was nothing less—lasted about 20 years; and taking all things into consideration, it could not have been a shorter time, although belittled by the historians. Mommsen is anxious to make it appear but 8 years, agreeing with Appian. In the account of Spartacus, written by Vellejus, we found this historian's statement as to the great numbers of that general's men, to perfectly agree with the circumstances in the case, although it throws a flood of light, clearing up and making perfectly reasonable, the details of that great war; and showing it to have been one of the most prodigious conflicts ever known. Yet great efforts seem to have been made to suppress the history of Spartacus, and modern authors appear surprisingly anxious to perpetuate the suppression of it.

The whole matter of Viriathus bears the appearance of having been caused by a wholesale effort on the part of the Roman gens or lords, to reduce Spain to slavery, to choke her liberty-loving people down to chains, dungeons and unpaid, enforced labor, turn her fruitful lands into slave-worked plantations and stock-farms latifundia, as in Sicily, and thus build up an arrogant landed aristocracy. The immense and long-continued resistance of this humble working man held that powerful race of optimates in check; and it may be one of the principal reasons of their having never succeeded in brutalizing the Spaniards as they did the people of Sicily.

CHAPTER IX.

EUNUS.

GRIEVANCES, MORE SALVATION ON THE VINDICTIVE PLAN.

THE IRASCIBLE IMPULSE in its Highest Development and most enormous Organization—Greatest of all Strikes found on Record—Gigantic Growth of Slavery—General View of Sicilian Landlordism and Servitude before the Outbreak—Great Increase of Bondsmen and Women—Enna, Home of the Goddess Ceres, becomes the Stronghold of the Great Uprising—Eunus; his Pedigree—He is made King of the Slaves—Story of his 10 Years' Reign—Somebody, ashamed to confess it, has mangled the Histories—The Fragments of Diodorus and other Noble Authors Reveal the Facts—Cruelties of Damophilus and Megallis, the immediate Cause of the Grievance—Eunus, Slave, Fire-spitter, Leader, Messiah, King—Vengeance—The innocent Daughter—Sympathy hand-in-hand with Irascibility against Avarice—Wise Selection by Eunus, of Achæus as Lieutenant—Council of War—Mass-meeting—A Plan agreed to—Cruelty of the Slaves—Their Army—The War begun—Prisons broken open and 60,000 Convicts working in the Ergastula set free—Quotations—Sweeping Extinction of the Rich—Large Numbers of Free Tramps join—Another prodigious Uprising in Southern Sicily—Cleon—Conjectures regarding this Obscure Military Genius—Union of Eunus, Achæus and Cleon—Harmony—Victories over the Romans—Insurgent Force rises to 200,000 Men—Proof—Overthrow and Extinction of the Armies of Hypsæus—Manlius—Lentulus—The Victorious Workingmen give no Quarter—Eunus as Mimic, taunts his Enemies by Mock Theatrical, Open-Air Plays in the Sieges—Cities fall into his Hands—His Speeches—Moral Aid through the Social Struggle with Gracchus at Rome—Arrival of a Roman Army under Piso—Beginning of Reverses—Crucifixions—Demoralization—Fall of Messana—Siege of Enna—Inscriptions verifying History—Romans Repulsed—Arrival of Rupilius—Siege of Tauromanion—Wonderful Death of Comanus—Cannibalism—The City falls—Awful Crucifixions—Second Siege of Enna—Its 20,000 People are crucified on the Gibbet—Eunus captured and Devoured by Lice in a Roman Dungeon—Disastrous End of the Rebellion or so-called Servile War.

THE enormous growth of slavery just before the beginning of the Christian era was the cause of several of the most gigantic and bloody uprisings the world has ever known. Those convulsive episodes invariably arose from maltreatment of workingmen and women. Dr. Bücher, whose delineations we so often quote, shows that the necessary workmen for supplying slave material to man the great estates which the Roman lords, about this time were grasping from the original cultivators who farmed the government land on shares thus turning them out of house and home, were bought and sold as common goods at ridiculously low prices.¹

In B. C. 103 there were at Rome scarcely 2,000 persons owning property considered taxable, such was the enormous monopoly of the public lands and of other property by a few.² These few property owners were proportionally richer and their management of the army and of the legislature, for suppressing uprisings of the outcasts and the enslaved proletaries was so much the more unlimited. The freedmen who had many organizations for protection which for centuries they had enjoyed when slaves were comparatively few, now found their unions, their business, their homes and freedom undermined and supplanted by countless hordes of slaves as prisoners of war, victims of the prodigious slave trade going on between Rome and foreign markets. When Tarentum was captured, B. C. 209, there were sold 30,000 war prisoners.³ In B. C. 207, after the battle of Metaurus, 5,400 were captured and sold. In B. C. 200 at least 15,000 were siezed and sold. In B. C. 137, the event of the return of Tiberius Gracchus from Sardinia, the fact that 80,000 men, women and children had been either killed or sold into perpetual slavery, was brought to light. Because Gracchus, whose grand nature, though a military commander, revolted against such atrocities and sought reform, he was set upon by a mob of infuriated legislators and wealth-owners, and murdered in the streets of Rome. Such was the enormous mass of the Sardinian slaves that prices fell to a ridiculously low ebb becoming a laughing stock and the proverb got abroad: "cheap as a Sardinian." After the siege of Perseus there were 70 cities destroyed and 150,000 people sold at the different slave markets.⁴

¹ Bücher, Aufstände der unfreien Arbeiter, S. 85-86; "Tit. Liv. XLI. 28: Ser. prouli Gracchi consulis imperio auspicioque legio exercitusque populi Romani Sardiniam subegit. In ea provincia hostium caesa aut capta supra octoginta milia." We elsewhere quote in our copious footnotes the sources whence modern authors derive their figures.

² Strabo Geographica, xiv. 668; Apulejus, IX.

This fearful condition of human slavery set into Greece still earlier. By a similar monopoly of land and of other property by the few, it came to pass that in the great city of Athens of 515,000 souls, only 9,000 (B. C. 300) could be allowed political rights graded and franchised by family and property.⁵ Other mention puts it at 21,000 souls or citizens.⁶ At the same time, when there were 21,000 propertied or blooded citizens and 10,000 strangers under protection of the city, there were 400,000 slaves.⁷ But as Athens at that time (B. C. 309,) counted 515,000 persons, we come into a knowledge of the fact that the remaining 84,000 were the plebeian or freedmen population.

The great city of Corinth whose census B. C. 300, gave only 40,000 "souls" had a slave population of 640,000 who of course, according to Plato⁸ and other aristocrats, could

⁴ Liv. XXVII. 16: "Milla trigenta servilium capitum dicuntur capta"

⁵ Liv. XLV. 24; Plutarch, Æmilius Paulus, 29.

⁶ Diodorus Siculus, XVIII. 18; Plutarch's Phocion, 28.

⁷ Bücher Aufstände, S. 84.

⁸ Athenæus, Deipnosophistæ, quoting Ctesicles;

⁸ Plato, De Legibus vi. in dissertat on on the immortality of the soul; Phædo passim; especially 74 125, 7. 8 9. Bekk.: Phædrus, 51-85; Republic, vii. 1-4, where the working-people are allotted half a soul, vi. 9: deformed by their craft and servile; So Timæus, xvii. shows how souls are a growth, lxxi. ad fin; Laws, ix. 8, fin; Statesman, 46: Yoking those who wallow in ignorance to a race of servile beings. The meaning here is that such as labor are undivine; i. e. not fully furnished with souls. Soul is in two parts, mortal and immortal, Statesman, 46, Timæus, 71, Laws, vi. 19. Nothing healthy in a slave's soul, says Plato, and quotes the Odyssey, XVII. 332-333. where far-thundering, aristocratic Jove deprives the slave of half his mind, soul or upper nature.

not possess souls because too mean to be honored by the gods with a thing so noble; and this accounts for their not being enumerated in the census of the city. They appear to have been too lowly to belong to the numbers of mankind.⁹

Notwithstanding this fearful condition of despotism we find that the Locrians in south Italy had no slaves, being organized communists. From the first settlement of this rich country by the Pythagoreans no slaves are known to have existed until after the Roman conquests;¹⁰ and consequently the culture among them of equal rights when it came to clash against the enormous spread of slavery by the cruel conquests of Rome, no doubt urged the great epidemic of uprisings which form the subject of this and other chapters of the present work.

It is somewhat surprising, in the full face of these facts and the agonizing struggles of competitive warfare upon which these brutalities existed, that men still ask in wonder regarding the causes of downfall of the Greek and Roman empires! Another veritable renaissance, this time comprising sociologic research and comparative history, is at our threshold, destined to clear up many a point that for want of a true knowledge of the problem of labor has, through the ages, lain obscured midst the shortcomings of scorn and the musty vellum of histories and of laws.

In Sicily the condition of affairs was shocking. This fruitful island, which as early as B. C. 210, had been conquered by Rome and turned into a Roman province, was an especial offering to that hideously cruel system of slavery which Roman character, above all others, seemed by nature most suited to develop with the blind attributes of barbarity. As an instance of their grasping concentration of Sicilian property into few hands we quote authorities to the effect that Leontini had but 88 landed property holders; Mutice but 188; Herbita 257; Agyrum 230. The property owners of whole cities could be counted by the dozen.¹¹ All Sicily was overrun with slaves by birth and slaves of the auction shambles. The original inhabitants were dispossessed and driven from the land or remained as slaves. The small farmers had been either annihilated or crowded together in little towns to eke out a wretched existence under the terrors of intimidation, or had been dragged down to bondage.¹² Great numbers of Syrians who from their mountain homes where they were inured to brisk physical activities, were brought over by the Romans in chains, to till the lands as slaves. Such was the extent of slavery everywhere.¹³ Greece at that time was being conquered and her hardy warriors humbled to slavery, sent in great numbers in chains to Syracuse to be transported to the fruitful lands which in the days of Verres were styled the granary of Rome.¹⁴ The Roman conquests of the Carthaginians and the victories over Hannibal were followed by the greater cruelties for their having been dearly won. Thousands of Africans hardened to army life in the Punic wars, were sent into Sicily as slaves to dig the soil for the proud Roman occupants of that land.¹⁵ Only the fattest portions of land were cared for, the new possessors' idea being only gain. Strabo declares that so far as the æsthetic was concerned all was a barren waste. There were many beautiful and fruitful valleys and some plateaus which had long been celebrated for fertility and fine landscape.

⁹ Xenophon, De Vectig. IV. 14; Athenæus V.; Böckh, Laurische Silberb. 122-4, all give accounts of great slave owners.

¹⁰ The Locrians had no slaves which seems to be regarded by Plato as something phenomenal: Timæus, ii. Bekk.; Böckh, Pub. Econ. Athn. also declares that they had no slaves. Not only did the ancients have vast numbers of slaves (see Encyc. Brit. vol. xx. p. 140), but there were many freedmen at a very early age. See Homer, Odyssey, XI. 460.

¹¹ Bücher, Aufst. d. unfr. Arb. S. 39.

Among the wonderfully fertile and paradisaical plateaus of Sicily was that of Enna, the seat of the greatest proletarian strike, insurrection or bond and free labor war of which history, tradition or inscriptions give an account in any country of the globe.

This great strike or labor mutiny of Enna in Sicily took place, according to the conclusions of Dr. Bücher,¹⁶ between the years 143 and 133 before Christ, lasting 10 full years. During a period of three years the Syrian slave-king Eunus, from Apamea near Antioch but a few leagues

¹² Diodorus Siculus, XXXIV. fragment II, 3, 4 and elsewhere, Dind.

¹³ Drumann, Arb. u. Komm. S. 24: "In Epidamnos gab es keine Handwerker als die öffentlichen Sklaven."

¹⁴ Diod. I. 1 2; I. 27; Columella, De Re Rustica, I. 6, 3, 8, 15, 16,

¹⁵ Strabo, Geog. VI.; Büch. S. 40.

¹⁶ Aufsätze d. unf. Arb. S. 121-128, Excurs. As to the name, notwithstanding Dr. Siebert, we follow the Greek Enna, though some Romans wrote "Henna."

to the northward of Nazareth, held sway over all of the central districts of Sicily; and from the most reliable evidence he reigned, after his coalition with Cleon in B. C. 140, for seven more years, over the whole island of Sicily.

Introductorily to this extraordinary fact, proving the great power and vigorous leadership of some of the ancient labor agitations, it will be necessary to bring upon the scene a brief description of the place, the prevailing social conditions and an outline of the character of the men.

The three leading men who originated and managed this great servile war, were Eunus, Achæus and Cleon. Their two enormous armies, aggregating 200,000 soldiers were united in B. C. 140, when Eunus was proclaimed the monarch over Sicily entire.

We thus introduce these three branded, enslaved workmen to the reader. We say branded and mean in the expression by no means a figure. They were not only branded, as at the moment we write, leaders of this labor movement are branded, with obloquy, black-list and stigma of men at the helm of public literature. They were literally and indelibly branded with hot irons.¹⁷ Large numbers of quotations from the authors most explicitly prove that all slaves were branded; and the field workers were not only branded on the forehead and limbs, but often on the body; and since they were obliged, like the helots of Sparta, to go mostly naked, these disfigurations were summer and winter exposed to view and not only was their disgrace stamped upon them forever but their chances of escape from bondage utterly destroyed.

Once on the very spot where this great outbreak of the slaves and freedmen occurred, the plateau valley of Enna, there lived a very rich man named Damophilus. He possessed legions of slaves whom he forced under sting of the lash, to work naked upon his farms. His wealth of acreage, latifundium, consisted in part of stock farms. These teemed with herds of cattle and other animals which in those times throughout Europe were a large source of ¹⁷ Büch. S. 42, "Dass Alle gebrandmarkt, nur die Feldarbeiter auch gefesselt waren." Consult the following ancient and modern works: Diodorus, XXXIV. frag. ii. 1, 27' 32, 36; Florus, III. 19; Marquardt, V. 1. 186; Mom. Römische Geschichte; Mom. G. I. no. 845; Siefert, Erst. Sicilisch. Sklavenkrieg, S. 12; Plato.

Roman wealth. One day a few of his poor, naked slaves, shivering in the chill winds of the mountain height upon which Enna stood, came to him and beseechingly implored a few rags to cover their bodies and shut out the cold which added to their sufferings. Their daring plea was answered by this cold-hearted capitalist with something like the following cutting leer: "Don't wandering tax-gatherers tramp the country naked and must'nt they give their clothes to those who want them? Would'nt I be taxed a customs duty on the rags I gave you?"¹⁸ With that Damophilus ordered the shivering wretches to be tied to the whipping post and warmed up with a sound flogging, then sent back naked to their labor of caring for their master's flocks of a thousand animals.

Under such intense aggravations what else could be expected than a secret organization of the thus abused and degraded laborers who worked the lands? This question comes the more cogently as we realize that large numbers of them were as intelligent or more so than their own masters. Just at this epoch, as already shown,¹⁹ all over Greece, Syria, Palestine, Asia Minor and the islands of the Archipelago vast numbers of trade unions and social societies existed among the freedmen and some among the slaves. We also know that when the Romans seized upon newly conquered countries they likewise seized the people, bond and free and sold them into slavery. Large numbers of these unfortunates were organized unionists, accustomed at home to the art and secret of practiced combination.²⁰ Another still more important cause of the terrible strike which resulted from such ill-treatment was a similarity of language. All Sicily was Greek. The Greek was the principal tongue spoken in Syria and even Phœnicia and other portions of Palestine at and before the time of Christ; although a bad Hebrew was the popular idiom. All the island inhabitants near by spoke the pure Greek. It also was spoken in Magna Græcia or Lower

¹⁸ Diod. frag. 11. 38, Dind.

¹⁹ Chapter XX. Infra. on trade unions citing inscriptions, laws &c. in evidence. Diodorus, XXXVI. frag. 6 Dind. tells us that not only slaves but many freedmen were engaged in these mutinies and strikes causing great tumults and confusions.

²⁰ Compare Lüders, Dionysische Künstler.; Also Foucart, Associations Rel. throws much light upon the subject of their religious beliefs.

Italy. Thus with intelligence, with a practiced knowledge of social combinations, with a sense of their wrongs made keen by the memory of happier days, with the true blood of the proud Greeks coursing more or less through their veins and finally but most practically, with the powerful Greek tongue uniformly at their command, they undertook that immense strike-rebellion amidst certain advantages which must go far toward clearing away the phenomena of its transient success.

The slave grievance rapidly grew into a movement for resistance in and around Enna, the little pastoral city, famous for its temple of Ceres whence Plato had carried Proserpine, the daughter of that goddess to whom shepherds, planters and especially working people had from a high antiquity looked, for her gifts of prosperity.²¹ Thus here we find the link completing the chain of curious interest connecting the history of the Eleusinian mysteries with that of the ancient labor movement. Those laboring people were religious; but about this time they were bitterly complaining that Ceres their favorite goddess had forsaken them.²² Enna was the original, ancient seat and citadel or throne of the great goddess Demeter, called in Latin Ceres. She was the protecting immortal who in the Pagan mythology, seated in her temple on the heights of Enna in the island's center, shielded all Sicily from famine. Her name had spread to foreign lands and she was worshiped in Attica and Syria. Thousands came on annual pilgrimages to Enna to worship at the temple of Ceres; and great feasts to her were here regularly celebrated, because she was believed the mother of the world and the fructifying goddess of all nutritious, fruit bearing seeds of agriculture, especially the cereals. Near that city lay, at the time of our story the meadow and by it the stream and the spring and grottoed rock where her beautiful daughter²³ Persephone or Proserpine, whilst gathering flowers, was stolen by Pluto and long hidden from her distracted mother. The meadow was bedecked with a grand carpeting of roses, hyacinths and violets and the soft zephyrs of summer were aromatic with their odors. All the landscape was adorned with nature's tempting vegetation. Many a tiny lake with pure, clear waters peeped from between the hills and hillocks of Enna and rich, well cultivated lands on every side were, and had for centuries been the pride of Sicily.²⁴ Wheat and other cereals had long prospered with such success that the place had obtained a celebrity. And yet, midst all these magnificent offerings of nature we see this region a scene of the most brutal and greed-cursed slavery to be found in the annals of that insatiate institution.

²¹ See chapter iv. on the mythical legend of Proserpine's abduction, the Eleusinian mysteries and the grievance of the proletarian outcasts.

²² Bücher, Aufstände, S. 52.

²³ Consult Encyc. Brit. Art. Ceres; La Rousse, Dict. Univ. Art. proserpine. Much literature is extant confirming these statements.

Antigenes is the name of one of a joint stock company whose business at that time was traffic in human beings. He certainly owned a city residence at Enna and kept his slaves about the house.²⁵ Among these was a man who, born and brought up in Apamea near Antioch, Syria, had more than probably been a leader of an *eranos*²⁶ or a thiasos in his native home. This is made the more probable by his being a pretentious prophet and Messiah while in a state of bondage at Enna. It was the wonderful Eunus; the magician, fire-spitter, wonder-worker, prophet and the plotter of the hugest slave insurrection of ancient or modern times; slave-king of Enna, then king of all Sicily and commander in chief at one time of over 200,000 soldiers;—the man who, with his sagacious generals, faithful and true, beat army after army of the Romans, sent years in succession to meet his slave and freedmen troops and who in the teeth, as it were, of Syracuse and of prouder Rome, actually reigned in humane splendor, apparently beloved and respected, for a period of ten years; constituting a veritable epoch of history, though nearly lost and quite unrecognized through the taint of labor. We shall confine ourselves to a relation of all the facts and particulars to be had, based upon the evidence quoted and which per-

²⁴Strabo, Geog. VI.; Consult the exquisite picture of the landscape given by Dr. Bücher, Aufstände etc. S. 52.

²⁵Diod. XXXIV. frag. II. 5, Dind.

²⁶*Id.* frag. II. I. 5, seq. For fuller description of these trade or labor unions see chapters XIII.—XX. Eunus, Cleon and Athenion were all born near the home of Jesus.

²⁷Büch. S. 54: "Er war ein grosser Magier und Wunderthäter, der zu den Göttern in nächster Beziehung stand und nicht nur im Traume von ihnen die Zukunft erfuhr, sondern auch in wachendem Zustande sie leibhaftig vor sich sah."

haps, no person on thorough criticism, will be able to controvert. Eunus was a prophet. He pretended to work miracles,²⁷ and was one of the ancient Messiahs.

But we must not suppose that he was a weak minded man because he knew how to blow fire from his mouth or because he vaunted presages which often came true. He was in all probability an extraordinary man, full of shrewd wisdom, endowed with almost superhuman courage and certainly with great judgment and patience in selecting his generals and in giving and indulging, to keep them in place and power while holding to himself supreme control.²⁸ When a slave he foretold that although the goddess Demeter or Ceres had apparently forsaken the poor, yet she was revealing herself in dreams to him and promising her might to their deliverance.²⁹ So certain was he of theocratic interference that he told of his mediatorial powers not only to his fellow working people but even to his master and to all the lords and ladies, who, to beguile their evening hours, used to invite or more probably, order him to recount the results of his nightly interviews with the august goddess. Pretending that as she was also the patron deity of Syria his native land, he maintained that she revealed herself to him with an assurance that he was to become a king and deliverer. Even these supernatural things he told to Antigones at these banquets amid the laughter and derision of the skeptical guests. His ingenuousness worked upon their curiosity and their invitations were apparently made with a purpose of amusement during their orgies of wine and gluttony. Their sport, he however, seems to have overlooked, taking their vein of merriment or ridicule in a manner peculiar to himself.

From what followed, it cannot be imputed to Eunus that he was weak minded. He promised Antigones to except and spare him on the day of wrath—an obligation which he religiously kept and faithfully carried out.

The cruelties of Damophilus,³⁰ who caused his working hands to be whipped, struck deeply into the sensitive feelings of thousands of other men. They were able to come together, secretly or otherwise to discuss their sufferings and form their plot. Dr. Bücher understands from gleanings of the Vatican and other fragments that the plot originated with the slaves of Damophilus.⁸¹ It is however, quite certain that what came to pass was spontaneous resulting from a combination of grievances and a strong religious belief in Eunos. The other slaves of Antigenes also took part.

²⁷ Diod. Idem, fragment II. 5, 6.

²⁸ Diod. XXXIV. 5, 6 7, and 8 of frag. II.

²⁹ Idem, XXXIV. frag. II. 34, 35. Dind.

Damophilus and his yet more cruel wife Megallis, appear to have been models of ferocity. Their young and beautiful daughter was the exception. Megallis was in the habit of whipping her female slaves to death with her own hand. It was like a mania people sometimes possess, for delighting in scenes of suffering. Endowed with unlimited power through the Roman laws and usages, to do as she pleased, she suited any action to fancy and gloried in tearing the poor life from her helpless victims. Nor was the ferocity of her husband much less. The incident we have recited was probably one of leniency compared with many that remain untold. Certain it is, that his atrocities together with those of his wife toward her defenceless female slaves are what decided this great uprising.

But we have the extremely pleasing assurance that the feeling which those slaves entertained toward the kind-hearted daughter of this ferocious pair—a young maiden whom they all loved—proved her palladium; for with the greatest tenderness they guarded and spared her through the scenes of blood.⁸²

Plans of a great revolutionary revolt were soon decided upon, and collusion with Eunos secured the sympathy of the city slaves. These arrangements were then communicated to those in the country.

The plot was thus completed and the moment set. All had enthusiastically determined to break loose by a desperate struggle, from their unendurable tortures and dauntlessly brave the storm with all the consequences this perilous action entailed. They had worked themselves up to believe that their goddess would be propitious.

By preconcerted arrangement, four hundred slaves assembled at the setting in of night, in a field near the citadel of Enna. They quickly organized a meeting. They then each took a sacred oath to persevere in their enterprise and hold fast together. The little multitude came armed. Their weapons each had obtained as best he could. All were armed with courage and with anger; and each determined to defend his new liberty to the death. They marched up to the Enna heights under a leader who used all his prodigious arts of legerdemain, gesture, and fire-spitting, to encourage them and prevent a panic. Without meeting resistance they gained admission through the gates, into the city.

⁸¹ Bücher Anfstände &c. 8. 55.

⁸² Diod. XXXIV. li. 89: "Ὅτι κατὰ τὴν Σικελίαν ἦν τοῦ Δαμοφίλου θυγάτηρ . . . Ἑρμεῖας, ἀπήγαγον εἰς Κατάνην πρὸς τινὰς οἰκείους."

There were the millionaires with their ladies, the temple of the goddess, the theatre, the place of entertainment. The insurgents instantly took possession of the streets and as they marched, singled out their well known victims. Rich men and women who long had held unbridled power over hitherto helpless slaves, now saw the danger as they felt their guilt. Pitiless was the retributive reaction of the enraged and surging mass. They brained their owners; and those who had made sport of their leader Eunus, likewise bit the dust. All slaves and prisoners found in dungeons and in irons were set free.²³ A terrible scene followed. Children were torn from their mothers' arms, and women ravished in presence of their husbands, who, bound in cords, could make no resistance to this fiendishness. Scenes of death were everywhere enacted; for from the onset of this bloody work, the slaves, stinging with a keen memory of their sufferings,²⁴ enjoyed with a peculiar glee which fills the savage, the opportunity, each with cuts and gashes to cross out his ghastly account. To a thus quickened lust of vengeance, there rushed a remembrance of the cruelties of Damophilus who gloated on the bruises of his clubs and the sting of his whips, and of Megallis, his wife, who had whipped to death her female servants. It was an hour of vengeance. All centered upon this sweetest morsel to the savage;—summary retribution. Blood of the now helpless rich flowed freely amid the yells of the naked slaves whose brands and scars gleamed hideously by the fires of the burning houses of their fallen masters. Great numbers of slave-holders paid their former acts of indiscretion with their lives.

²³ Diod. XXXIV. frag. ii. 12.

²⁴ Id. §. 49

Large numbers of slaves who were kept in service within the city and who had previously been prepared for the crisis, now joined the insurgents, swelling their forces and making the capture of the city complete.

We have in other pages²⁸ shown that in nearly all trade unions, especially the branch of them known as the thiasoi, they seem to have had an officer whose duty it was to foretell, work miracles and do other sage things, such as in those early ages of the world were not only common, but were thought necessary. The idea of a Messiah or deliverer sent from heaven to ransom the lowly from their everywhere prevailing misery permeated all their organizations.²⁹ Eunus therefore, in his pretensions, but copied from thousands.

The hours of grateful vengeance sped on the breezes of that truculent lullaby. Object after object of their detestation and hatred was dragged forth and amid screams for mercy, relentlessly silenced with knife, flames and blood until before the fury waned the pitiful wails of the slaughtered grew faint through sheer extermination.

But one there was who yet remained uncaptured and unpunished. This was Damophilus. On consultation it was ascertained that he was cowering in his pavillion, a little distance from the city. The insurgents sent thither a detachment with orders to bring him in alive. By this time the rage of the slaves had begun to assuage. They brought their great abuser before Eunus in the auditorium of the theatre, whither they adjourned to hold a trial of his case. Damophilus, covered with wounds and bleeding, his arms pinioned, his fine dress torn and soiled, was dragged before the still maddened crowd, his wife Megallis with him, both trembling in fateful expectancy of their doom.

The rich man was granted an opportunity to answer and spar the scathing accusations that were heaped upon him—bitter reminders of his mercilessness to them when the power was his to abuse them. But Damophilus coyly and cunningly met each accusation with words clothed in ambiguity and dazzle and parried off their bitter bluntness by his affected utterances of honeyed words. He was making inroads upon their sympathies when Zeuxes and Hermias, two powerful Greek slaves, who had themselves, in other days been victims of his cruelty, rushed between him and hope, one with a dagger and the other an axe. These men were keenly sensible to the progress Damophilus was making on the susceptibilities of his tatterde-malion jury; and fearing lest his mellifluous explanations should overcome them and that they might thus commit the absurdity of punishing thousands less stamped with cruelties and turn loose the deep-dyed monsters whose atrocities were the immediate cause of the revolt,* they crashed down the aisle of the theatre, advanced upon him weapons drawn and put a violent end to this mock trial of their foe by beating out his brains upon the spot. Diodorus relates that one of them stabbed him with a knife in the side and the other chopped off his head with the axe. Nor was this all. The terrified Megallis, who must have seen the reeking knife and the merciless guillotine by which her husband had fallen, heard his pleadings for an extension of life and with horror beheld his ghastly punishment, was delivered up, bound hand and foot, to the tender mercies of her female slaves little less instinctively savage than their male companions frenzied with woman's hatred and still goaded by memory's spectres of their own mothers and daughters perishing under the lash once wielded by this most pitiless enemy, the now supplicating Megallis' own hand. Little could be hoped for under such circumstances. Mercy was impossible. The horrified and shrieking lady was, like Damophilus, arraigned for mock trial before a horde of nude and blood-grimed women, taunted until each embittered one requited herself with censure and derision, with dallying flings and a satiety of jeers such as only wild women avenging a wounded love, possess the genius to consummate. When all these preliminaries were ended, Megallis was seized by a dozen muscular females, stripped of her finery and undoubtedly her clothes, dragged to the pinnacle of a lofty crag in which the mountain city of Enna abounds. All effort of the shrieking, fainting woman to wriggle out of their clutching fingers fast fixed upon her throat and body were unavailing.

²⁸ Chapter xviii. and elsewhere.

²⁹ Foucart, Associations Rel.

* Diod. frag. ii. 14, Diodor.

and fruitless. They drew her out upon the projecting prominence yawning over the abyss well known to the shuddering unfortunate as the Golgotha of miscreants and recalcitrant slaves. From these frowning crags eagles and ominous night-birds were wont to startle the listener with their screams. Legends of horrors of this fatal rock were told by mothers as early inculcations to their babes. This wretched victim may have also more than once contributed her ingenuity descanting upon its boding gloom and terrors as she lavished it on the torture of her now avenging chattels.

But all this sentimentalism suffices nothing in presence of so ghastly a reality as the death that now frowned, and stared this quivering mother in the face. The unimpressible avengers were not to be frustrated by the moans and sobs which formed a part of the solace of their grievances. When they had dragged her to the very brink they no doubt made her undergo some of the prevailing formulas of death and then plunged her headlong down the precipice where she was battered to a jelly upon the sharp flints of the dell below. Such, according to Diodorus, Strabo, the modern critics and some tale-telling inscriptions, was the fate of an ancient millionaire and his wife whom great prosperity had rendered void of all the amenities and loveliness of civilized life.

There yet remained one member of that fate-stricken family—the daughter already alluded to; a young lady of both tender age and heart. This damsel had from her babyhood shown exceeding sympathy and kindness toward the female slaves in their misfortunes. Never had she taken part in her mother's cruelties. She had, on the contrary, shown them the tenderest commiseration; and her many little offerings during their sufferings, had often gone far in the direction of healing a breach between fate and despair. Those whom the master's love of vengeance had left bound and often chained in dungeons of the ergastulum, with which ancient slave farms were cursed, she had comforted and administered to. Could such kindness be now forgotten? Could the remembrance of this child-benefactress, even in that awful vortex of violence, be overlooked? Could conscience be stifled even midst butcheries whose mocking carnival made death a satire upon empty ideas of right and wrong? Or could such a pretty thing as sympathy wedge itself in amongst the howls and turbulence that shook this scene of oblivion and of death? Yes. A love which was stamped into their fierce, rough natures still lived and warmed them like a sunbeam, forcing itself foremost, even into this terrible qualm reacting against morality. Not a ruthless hand was laid upon her trembling form. Speechless unanimity prevailed on the question of sparing her life. All would spare and protect a faithful friend. On consultation Hermias, one of her father's executioners, was chosen leader of a picked band who soon after performed the perilous task of escorting her safely to the distant city of Catana, the home of some relatives near the sea.

We have in this episode another instance substantiating the opinion heretofore expressed, that the emotion of sympathy has been a growth in the breast of the crushed and humiliated classes, fledged from their schools of mutual love or commiseration and common support. Poor people are themselves the makers of most of the sympathies which they enjoy. Even the daughter of Damophilus grew in sympathy at the sight of misery. However rude the crust screening from view our inner nature, that nature never had, under Pagan control, much sympathy allowed it. Sympathy seems clearly to have been a growth out of a vast association in many parts of ancient Greek and Roman states and did not thrive among the opulent. Concupiscence with its cupidity and irascibility were the pillars on which rested the ancient paganism and its aged competitive system; and though the majorities who were of the working class possessed enough of the latter in its crudest form, yet they had little greed or avarice. They in fact, developed sentiments of a reverse nature. They longed for a socialism that would breed sympathy with its mutual love and care. Diodorus, one of our informants on this subject of the slaves of Enna, in referring to their treatment of the daughter of Damophilus and Megallis, says: "These slaves on strike demonstrated, in showing no sympathy or mercy to those who had been their masters and in delivering themselves up to their own violence and wrath, that what they did was not the mean promptings of barbarity, but a just retribution or punishment for the injustice which had been done to them;"³⁹ bold words indeed, but just and true; and the student of sociology may now divine the reasons why that brave publicist has lain for 2,000 years in obloquy, with his wonderful tales and descriptions in tatters among the rubbish of the vaults, or later, in the literary sepulchres of the Vatican.

It appears that this theatre which had been the scene of the fury we have described became the focus of deliberation after the frenzy of their vengeance had subsided and the more serious matters connected with the future began to force themselves upon their reflection. They saw that as soon as the news of their action reached Rome, the scornful power which for ages had thrived by conquest and its booty of lands and slaves, there would spring up an immense army to suppress them. They had the sagacity to foresee that their only hope was in a strong army well equipped and disciplined, powerful enough to cope, even with the forces of Rome. It further appears from the evidence that so deep had been the foresight and so long the communings on this matter, so secretly had the whole uprising been concocted, that all things necessary to this resistance were well-nigh prepared beforehand; and the general appearance with its sequel demonstrate that the central idea of a tumultuous feast of blood and dissipation and of subsequent demoralization and gluttony was far from them. But it cannot be denied that they had already determined to throw down the slave system of which they were victims and upon its ruins build up a social fabric which should deal equitably and humanely by all. To one acquainted with the vast and inexhaustible power of Rome, this dream of the poor slave socialists would have seemed an absurd machination of the fancy. But on the other hand they were on an island with whose rocky cliffs, caverns, forests and by-paths they were well acquainted. They wanted to build up a kingdom of men and women emancipated from slavery and economic want with their leader Eunus, on the throne. They held good to this resolution.

Eunus was elected king.⁴⁰ It does not appear that their choice of him was on account of any military tact which he had shown as their leader nor on account of his superior capacities of any kind, unless it was that of working wonders. This however, was extremely necessary in the mind of superstitious men, as were most of the ancients, especially the laboring class who, in their unions among the freedmen, often kept a sorcerer who knew how to spit fire, dawdle with the little oracles and pronounce prophecies. Even the rich had their magi or fortune-tellers and their haruspices, as well as higher priests who often decided the turn of conquests by the simple consultation of an oracle. Eunos could blow fire, tell wonders, pretend and prophecy; and Eunos was elected king. Again, the name Eunous, the benificent, was considered a harbinger of deeds certain to bring forth good.

³⁹ Diod. XXXIV. fragment ii. 39.

⁴⁰ Idem. frag. ii. 14.

King Eunos, on receiving his crown, rose equal to the majesty of his new estate. He assumed all the oriental bearing of kingly dignity. He established the offices of state with such splendors as he could command. There was given him for a queen a female slave who like himself, hailed from Apamea in Syria—probably old playmates. Such was the happy one to be raised to the queenship. To crown himself in still more royal imitation of the dignities of his fatherland he named himself Antioch.

From the moment Eunos began his reign he appears to have been successful. Full details are wanting. From Cicero we have hints⁴¹ that the temple of Ceres or Demeter was preserved with scrupulous care, as well as all the property belonging to it. No doubt however, he changed the officers of the temple from high priests to vestal virgins, supplanting the old by a choice of his own people.

Bücher thinks⁴² that his administration from first to last, considering all circumstances peculiarly connected with the character and notions of the Semitic and Aryan races with whom he had to deal, showed more than usual fitness. He understood the theory of government. It is certain that at Enna there was one of those cavern prisons, such as had been dug by Dionysius the tyrant at Syracuse. We know that those pestilential subterranean ⁴¹ Cicero. Verres. iv. 50, 112.

⁴² Aufst. S. 59: "Mehr als gewöhnliche Befähigung." Siefert, S. 18; "Man wählte ihn zum könig weil er den Aufstand begonnen hatte."

dungeons existed in great numbers, called by the Romans ergastula, in many parts of Italy and Sicily. They were often underground workshops like the quarries—the horror of the ancient slave. Florus and Diodorus combine in the statement that more than 60,000 fighting soldiers of the great rebel army were convicts turned loose from these prisons⁴³ during the war. Eunus incarcerated a large number of the rich in the holes at Enna and it may be presumed that the old prisoners were first discharged to give room for the new. A council of war was held and it was decided to put all these many prisoners to death. This was the result of a mass meeting of the faithful and unfaltering to Eunus, as a forewarning of the certain result of taking part in any effort to escape, or of mixing and intriguing to restore the old government. Few of the old rule people were left alive except the free mechanics who could make arms; and even they were compelled to work in fetters. To those who had invited Eunus to a seat of mock honor on account of his pretended powers in legerdemain and gifts of divination at their symposiums and for the amusement of guests, and whom he had promised their lives in case he realized his heaven-offered kingdom, he held good his word. He also saved them their fortunes.⁴⁴ They were spared by a royal decree and the mandate was sent them in true regal form. He also saved the temples and other holy property.⁴⁵

At length Eunus called a council of permanent government. First of all was chosen Achæus. "He was, in a formal manner made consiliarius of the faithful" The ancient author who leaves us these choice fragments of history⁴⁶ suffixes his opinion that Eunus in making choice of him as lieutenant and counselor general, showed wonderful ability and prudence. This man understood and deeply sympathized with the Syrian element of which the slave population of Enna by conquest was largely composed. But he was moreover endowed with extraordi-

⁴³ Florus, Epit. Hist. Rom. III. 19, § 6; "Hoc miraculum primum duo millia ex obviis, mox jure belli refractis ergastulis, sexaginta amplius millia fecit exercitum."

⁴⁴ Diod. XXXIV. frag. ii. 42; "Τῶν ὁλῶν δὲ τοῖς ἀποστάταις καταστὰς κέρως."; Bücher, Aufst. S. 59; Siefert, Skizzenk. S. 17.

⁴⁵ Cic. Verr. iv. 50, 112.

⁴⁶ Diod. Id. frag. ii. 42.

nary wisdom and unscrupulous will-power in expedients, where emergencies required it. He was capable of fearlessly organizing, on the inspection of a circumstance, a resistance powerful enough to shatter the peril whatever it might be ; and he had the judgment and force of character to push it to its immediate and successful results. He was bold enough to plainly tell to Eunus his misgivings and impart to him the truth ; and that dignitary had wisdom and a sufficient amount of common sense to hear him with composure and acquiesce in his views. A perfect agreement was the result.

Dr. Bucher gives it as his opinion that Achæus was one of the thousands of unfortunates who had been reduced to slavery through the Roman conquest of Achaia, B. C. 146, or about 3 years before.⁴⁷ Achaia being in the heart of the Greek Peninsula, on the gulf of Corinth, near and including the great city of that name, was of purest Greek ; and Greeks in those days were mighty men. But the brutal fiat of Roman conquest had recently swept over the whole Grecian territory and buzzard-like, swallowed up her famous provinces and cities and sold her braves into slavery. We thus find circumstantial evidence that Achæus had the sagacity, acumen and intrepidity of his race. So well pleased was the slave-king with Achæus that he made him a present of one of the fine houses of his former millionaire masters.

The success of the great insurrection from henceforth is to be attributed in great measure to Achæus, general-in-chief. In three days he had armed and equipped no less than 6,000 soldiers and had them ready for the expected armies from Rome which all well knew would soon arrive by forced marches to put down the rebellion. As all these slaves knew the awful consequences of defeat, we may imagine the incentives which prompted their activity in making ready for coming conflicts.

The outside agricultural places soon began to be heard from. They consisted of heterogeneous ranks—a motly mass, who, rushing from their work on hearing the news of the revolt, straggled into the new head-quarters from far and near. They streamed into the town, each with a butcher-knife, an axe, a sickle, a pitchfork of iron or wood. Slings were weapons with which the numerous shepherds were best practiced; and they knew their use with fatal effect. Inspired with a hope of liberty at any price or agony of effort, they were ready to stake their lives under perilous odds for a chance at winning it.

⁴⁷ Aufst. d. unf. Arb. S. 60.

There were at that moment no troops of the Roman legions in Sicily. The only immediate forces to be feared by the workingmen were the militia from the different cities. There had occurred no dangerous strikes among the slaves for many years here, and in consequence, Rome had not, as in Etruria, on the Tarantine gulf and elsewhere, provided a standing army kept stationary under a prætor for the express purpose of suppressing the ever-recurring rebellions of labor⁴⁸ which were not only in this nation troublesome but had proved themselves at Sparta and Athens a great source of danger. Besides this, Rome was busy quelling similar disorders nearer home. The only available force at hand was the militia.

Meanwhile the insurgents were recruiting a powerful force by tapping every resource that offered a promise of strength. Among others, as already noticed, the great cavern jails were full.⁴⁹ All through the country these workhouses whether underground, in towns or out on the farms, were broken into and emptied, the prisoners ransomed and those able to bear arms welcomed to the army of resistance.⁵⁰ Our principal resource whence we extract these facts is Diodorus Siculus, who wrote elaborately on the subject, often giving minute details; but being an honest man and writing of his own native country, committed what in his times seems to have been the error—though no fault of his conscience—of telling the truth. We in consequence, as students of sociology must charge against that slave-holding aristocracy,⁵¹ all mutilation of his history, especially those paragraphs delineating the Roman disaster

⁴⁸ Liv. XXIX. 17, 41, XXXII. 26 XXXIII. 36.

⁴⁹ Diod. XXXIV. frag. ii. 36: "Καὶ τούτων τοὺς μὲν πένδαις δεσμεύων εἰς τὰς συνεργασίας ἐνέβαλλε." Damophilus had also made them work in the fields while chained.

⁵⁰ Diod. frag. ii. 25 26.

⁵¹ A similar outrage has been committed upon Livy's history of Spartacus proved by the epitomes or chapter headings XCV. XCVI. & XCVII. which have survived the wreck. We give further details of this disaster together with that of Sallust, farther on.

which followed; for although some clauses are left complete others are bereft of their treasures of priceless information. A large portion of the details, amounting in all, to chapters, has apparently been sequestered through the vandalism of contemporaneous censorship and the inestimable manuscripts disrupted from their historical chain covering at least ten years of this eventful rebellion which went far toward shaping the actions of men and preparing the world for the advent of a different culture.

At any rate we have a statement that not less than 60,000 prisoners were delivered from the *ergastula*⁵² and we know that these also joined the rebellion. Everywhere were the slave-holders murdered, and in proportion as the more desperate ones were delivered from bondage and fetters, the search all over the island to find and exterminate them became more industrious. On the eastern side of Sicily were magnificent fields of wheat and different grains and a large amount of pasture lands stocked with cattle and sheep and bearing prodigious quantities of wine and olive oil. The slave hordes now free, swept over this country, murdering and destroying all before them, notwithstanding the efforts of Achæus at restraint. The story of Cambalus, a wealthy citizen of Morgantion in the upper districts of Symæthus, is told⁵³ as an exception to the usual prudence of this commander: This nobleman while on a hunting excursion came across a band of these prowlers. Alarmed at his close proximity to the dangerous men he turned and ran toward the city, following the high road. When near his own home he met his father on horseback going toward the danger, who immediately dismounted and begged the son to mount and save himself by flight. While thus in filial and paternal love, tarrying, neither deciding to take to flight, the freebooters came up and killed them both.⁵⁴ But Achæus generally forbade such strong measures. Wherever he heard of atrocities committed by his men he is said to have exerted every energy to prevent their recurrence, appealing to the danger should the Romans gain the upper hand. The rebels began to comprehend that something nobler than mere rage was wanted. They soon began to be more careful of the stores of grain and other necessities. They also spared a large number of the small cultivators who had not been active in injuring them.

⁵² Florus, Epit. III. 15, elsewhere quoted.

⁵³ Mannert, Geog. IX. 2; Cato, De Re Rustica. 6; Columella, De Re Rustica III. 2.

⁵⁴ Dr. Bücher, Anfänge der unfreien Arbeiter, S. 61, extracts the story in full: "Gorgos, mit dem Beinamen Kambalos, ein durch seinen Reichtum und Edelmut bekannter Bürger von Morgantion im Gebiete des oberen Symæthus zog auf die Jagd aus und stiess auf eine Sklavenbande. Er floh die Strasse zur Stadt zurück und begegnete bald seinem Vater der zu Pferde des Weges kam. Dieser stieg sofort ab und flehte den Sohn sein Leben zu retten. Der Sohn hinstehend wieder den Vater; und während sie so in dem Wettstreite kindlicher Liebe und väterlicher Zärtlichkeit sich erschöpften, erschienen die Aufrührer und erschlugen beide."

There were also great numbers of freedmen, now little better than beggars; for as most farm labor since the new impetus of the Roman slave system had set in, was performed by slaves, they were obliged to beg because they had no work. These wretched tramps, perceiving their opportunity, soon began to organize in secrecy.⁵⁵ The great war now raged in earnest. The new force of beggars who hitherto had been roaming in a demoralized condition do not seem to have done credit to the slaves; for while they turned their hands to destruction of property and delivered themselves up to gluttony, their faults were all laid to the slaves. By this circumstance we are made aware that the actual status of intelligence was higher among the slave population than the tramps, who had become demoralized and degraded through discouragement and suffering.

It was a long time before the Romans, tormented with the terrible struggles of the proletaries at that moment raging in Italy over the agrarian question, could awaken to a full sense of the situation. There was certainly some provincial government at the time, for mention is made to the effect that Roman prætors⁵⁶ then had the province in charge; but they were both too much enfeebled by their enormous wealth at Syracuse or the dissipation concomitant to it and by their being practically without a force sufficient to the emergency. The insurrection seems not to have been uniform in different parts. In those days it took some time for slaves to communicate with each other; and when that was accomplished there must be time to ponder over the dangerous experiment and prepare for action; but it is known that almost everywhere in, and close about the cities, the uprising was general; for everywhere the slaves ran away from their masters and hurried to join the Ennian army.

⁵⁵ Diod. XXXVI. frag. 7. speaking of the second war (see chapter XI.), expressly states that it was not the slaves alone but also freedmen. So also Florus. III. 19: "Cum liberis (nefas!) et ingenuis, dimicatum est."

⁵⁶ Mûcher, Aufst. S. 61-62.

Achæus in a short time found himself master of a well equipped army of 10,000 men. He devoted his energies to drilling these raw troops and teaching them their new business. We are wanting details for showing the exact dates, but the events of which we speak, according to the close examination of all material by Dr. Bücher, make it between B. C. 143 and 140.⁵⁷ Repeated skirmishing took place between Achæus and the advance guards of the Roman prætors but as often the latter were totally overthrown. Undoubtedly many great and terribly bloody battles were fought.⁵⁸ Certainly the results were disastrous to the Romans; for the territory of Eunus' kingdom gradually enlarged stretching over upper Symæthus and eastward down to the sea. It also struck northward and extended for a considerable distance to the west. But we hear of nothing having occurred in the south, up to this point.⁵⁹ There was however, a great uprising there, soon to be heard of. The signal successes of Achæus had become noised abroad. Slaves everywhere were waiting for a leader. A new and almost distinct strike was preparing to burst forth southward near the coast, among the productive fields and pastures long celebrated for stock-breeding, especially that of draft animals and fine horses. Along this seaboard no harbors appear. The land lies in plateaus, with precipitous steeps overhanging the Mediterranean; but the levels above and the occasional valleys, are exceedingly fruitful.⁶⁰ It was the celebrated Agrigentum. Along the southern coast of Sicily at that time few inhabitants existed. The old places which had once been occupied by the colonists from Megara and Rhodes had been long depopulated.

Acragus, well remembered by the Romans as having

⁵⁷ Idem, Exkurs, "Über die Chronologie des sicilischen Sklavenkriege und Verwandtes." S. 121-129. Here Bücher gives data (which we follow,) showing that it must have been B. C. 143-140 or the first two years before the army of Achæus amounted to 10,000 men.

⁵⁸ Diod. XXXIV, frag. ii. Dind.

⁵⁹ Bücher, Aufst. S. 62. We mostly follow Bücher's admirable tracings of the war from this point.

⁶⁰ Strabo, Geog. VI.; Cicero, Verr. II. 1. 23; D'Oroville, Sicula, p. 289-Plin. H. N. VIII. 34

withstood, during the Punic wars all those terrible vicissitudes and had long been inured to hardships, still maintained itself and a good share of its population. It was a rich portion of the island and large numbers of the land owners possessed and exploited slaves who became so numerous that they performed all the labor leaving none for the freedmen who were thus reduced to the condition of roaming tramps and beggars. Some men owned 500⁴¹ in the earlier days and there still existed very rich men in the city, holding large portions of land and many human creatures as chattels. Here was the seat of a recorded instance of the prevailing cruelties: One Polias, having invited to dinner an equally heartless slaveholder, who was unwilling to allow his slaves rest long enough to sleep, called together his own, especially the women and children, and like the animals, fed them nuts and dried figs—the only nourishment they were allowed for supper.⁴²

It is not to be wondered at then, if the slaves whenever opportunity offered, ran away from such masters and sometimes became cunning and dangerous brigands.

Another desperate character of this war was Cleon, called in Livy, "Gleon," a Cilician by birth,⁴³ from the town of Comana in the Taurian region of southern Asia Minor. It appears that he and his brother, called "Coma" by Valerius Maximus in his Memorabilia,⁴⁴ were runaway slaves who, having betaken themselves to the mountains drove a marauding business in the general interest of their fellows still in bonds. Here they plied the arts of the latrocinia or highway robbery, and stood ready to espouse the rebellion of Eunus which was now creeping toward their confines. Another theory of Cleon is that like Spartacus, he had elsewhere learned to be a robber but had been seized by a Sicil-

⁴¹ Siefert, Sicilische Sklavenkriege. S. 38.

⁴² Stobæus, Floril. LXII. 48; Cf. Bücher, 64.

⁴³ In his note 2, S. 64, Dr. Bücher refers to Cleon's birthplace, as follows: "Diod. fr. 2, 43: ἐκ τῶν περὶ τὸν Ταύρον τόπων. Nach § 20 hiess sein Bruder Komanos (Coma bei Valer. Max. IX, 12, 1 ext. ist offenbar ein Schreibfehler statt Comanus), woraus mit ziemlicher Sicherheit zu schliessen, dass Komana die Vaterstadt der beiden Brüder war. Ob aber an die pamphylische oder an die kappadokische Stadt dieses Namens zu denken sei, muss unentschieden gelassen werden. Letztere, inmitten des Antitauros am Saros gelegen, war eine Hauptstätte des den syrischen Diäneten verwandten Cultus der Ma (Artemis Taurica) Strabo XII. p. 535; man würde dann den Beweggrund für den raschen Anschluss Kleons an Eunus in religiöser Superstition zu suchen haben.

⁴⁴ Diod. XXXIV. frag. ii. 20 & 43.; Valerius Maximus, IX. 12; Siefert, 19.

ian corrair and brought over to this place where he was sold in slavery and set to work herding horses in the pastures, whence he escaped and made himself the terror of the region, playing his old pranks with success. But this theory fails to account for his brother.

By some means Cleon, who had a strong band ever on the alert, heard of the great movement of Eunos at Enna. The distance was certainly not so great but that they could have held correspondence; especially after the forces of Achæus had, by victory after victory over the prætorian militia, cleared the obstacles away.

Cleon on hearing the particulars of the insurrection, ran up the flag of open rebellion and offered freedom to all slaves who should espouse his cause. The mighty name he had already won went far toward deciding innumerable slaves. Everywhere these Agrigentine bondsmen responded to the shrill bugles of Cleon. As fast as they came into camp he armed and drilled them for service. Battles must have followed for we find him in possession of the city. The two most powerful captains of the rebellion now stood over-against each other, both having won battles, undoubtedly important ones; for as our details are missing and the leading points preserved, we are left to our imagination in making up the links in the chain of history. It was now the hope of the rich owners that these rough commanders would, though at first victorious, soon have a falling out; that jealousy would prove a quicker means of ridding them of their now terrible enemy than their own opposition; for such were the proportions of this uprising that Cleon soon counted upwards of 70,000 men.⁶⁵ With such an army it was reasonably conjectured that he would not long submit to a subordinate position under Eunos. Bücher in assuring us that the reverse was the case,⁶⁶ suggests that the cause of the perfect harmony known to have existed may have been Cleon's superstitious faith in the infalibility of Eunos as a mediator for poor humanity between God and man; it being fully believed that he was a Messiah.⁶⁷ This might have done much, but the fact that they knew that in the absence of perfect harmony their own lives would certainly be speedily lost, together with their cause, is the more probable solution to this problem. Cleon accepted a position of what, in our military terms, may be called a brigadier general, of the grand army under Eunus, or rather under Achæus, lieutenant-general to Eunus; and the force assigned him was only 5,000 men.

⁶⁵ Livy, LVI. "C. Fulvio Consuli mandatum est, hujus belli initium fuit Eunu's servus, natione Syrus; qui contracta agrestium servorum manu et solutis ergastulis justis exercitus numerum implevit. Gleon quoque, alter servus, ad septuaginta millia servorum contraxit: et copiis junctis adversus populi Romani exercitum bellum sæpe gesserunt."

⁶⁶ Bücher, Aufst., S. 65.

The two armies of the great mutiny against capital became thus consolidated into one. It is stated by Livy that in Agrigentum alone there were 70,000 men under arms;⁶⁸ and we have seen that Achæus already had a large, victorious force. Thus the combined armies steadily grew in numbers and discipline. This immense force was divided up between many leaders; Eunus being the commander-in-chief with Achæus and soon afterwards Cleon, the two principal lieutenants.

The armies stretched from Enna to Agrigentum and a wing extended south and eastward to the sea—perhaps as far eastward as Syracuse. Soon after these arrangements were accomplished the new prætor arrived in Sicily with an army of well equipped Roman soldiers consisting of 8,000 men. How many stragglers of those demoralized forces whom Achæus had often punished and dispersed, came to swell the freshly landed army of this prætor, L. Plautius Hypsæus,⁶⁹ does not appear. But Dr. Siefert, on the strength of a statement of a fragment, says that no regular troops accompanied Hypsæus from Rome.

Hostilities south now became general. The Roman did not have long to wait. A force of 20,000 slaves probably of both Achæus and Cleon met him, fully inspired with the supernatural powers of their fire-spitting king, as well as burning with old hatred and a desire to settle accounts with their enemies. A great battle was fought. Hypsæus was utterly routed and ruined; and the rebels were left masters of the field.

⁶⁷ Florus, III. 19, 4: "Syrus quidam nomine Eunus fanatico furore simulato dum Syriæ deæ comas jactat, ad libertatem et armas servos, quasi numerum imperium concitavit; idque ut divinitus fieri probaret, in ore abdita nuce, quam sulphure et igne stipaverat, leniter inspirans, flammam fundebat."

⁶⁸ Liv. LVI. Epit. ad fin.; See quotation in note 65.

⁶⁹ Diod. frag. ii. 18. This is probably a remnant of a full statement now mostly lost.

The news of this additional victory spread rapidly and those slaves who had hitherto hesitated, now flocked to the insurgent army, soon swelling it to the almost incredible magnitude of 200,000 men. The language of our information is, however, too assuring to warrant us in dallying over doubts; for not only do the ancient authorities give these figures but we also find the strong reinforcement of the modern philological critics who make no hesitation in pronouncing it to be true.⁷⁰ The people at Rome entertained hopes that the force under Hypsæus would be of sufficient strength to put down the rebellion; but as time wore by, straggling remnants of the shattered army verified a dismal fear that great disasters had befallen them; otherwise the gloomy news of the expedition was lost.

Other expeditions soon followed the sad one just mentioned. As we know that in a similar rebellion by Spartacus some 70 years later, the armies of Rome were large, so in reason, we cannot imagine them to have been small in Sicily. Time and other despoilers have deprived us, it is true, of many details, in histories we know to have been written. But enough remains to attest the enormous proportions of the Sicilian labor rebellion and the success that everywhere attended the arms of the workingmen. C. Fulvius Flaccus, consul, appears next to have come to the scene; his colleague Scipio Africanus going to Numantia. This commander was however, preceded by a certain Manlius, mentioned in the fragments of Diodorus referred to. He, like his predecessors was annihilated. There can be no doubt that this word applies here in its literal sense. So complete was the extinction that scarcely a human being ever returned to convey intelligence of the disaster to Rome. Then followed Lentulus, afterwards Piso and Rupilius. Whenever the Romans gained an advantage by dint of superior military skill they lost it through the overwhelming and ever increasing numbers of the slaves, who in addition to their own manufacture of arms and munitions of war which they forced the freedmen-mechanics⁷¹ of Sicily to accomplish for them, turned all the splendid weapons wrested from the defeated warriors of the Roman nobility to their own uses and grew invincible.¹¹

⁷⁰ Büch. S. 65: "Bald betrug sie gegen 200,000 Leute;" also S. 126: "Nicht lange nachher beläuft sich die Zahl der Aufständischen insgesamt, Soldaten, Sensenmänner, und Ungerüstete, auf 200,000, "und in vielen Kriegen kämpfen sie glücklich, seltener erleiden sie Niederlagen."

No prisoners were spared. Eunus had undoubtedly resolved upon this plan from the first. He killed Antigenes his owner, also Python, with his own hand, both of whom he had promised a "cheap deal," and spared the friends of the festivities as we have related, only as a matter of faith with his word. He had opened all the dungeons of the ergastula which confined many who labored in those grottoes. What more could they want of those disgusting holes? No. With them there was no lingering prisoner. To be taken prisoner was to die—a ferocious necessity! Besides these barbarous economies, they possessed the remarkable negligence of the Romans which had struck into Sicily at the time of the defeat and final evacuation of the island by the Carthagenians, in B. C. 210. Everywhere the walls of cities and other fortified places were battered down, and left mouldering in disuse and everywhere was found unhindered admission to the cities, the storehouses and the citadels.¹² Much of the success of their phenomenal marches was attributed to the supernatural powers of king Eunus.

They believed themselves invincible; and as time wore on, year after year of undiminished prosperity apparently fortified this belief. Eunus once led his victorious forces before one of the few fortified places that attempted to withstand him and to the besieged inhabitants spoke with bitter irony, denying that he was even the cause of the trouble, or his men in rebellion. On the contrary, they themselves by their former atrocities, had driven them to a compulsory step which they little desired to take. In full consciousness of their enemy's helplessness and the stinging remembrance of their former sufferings, they made a great show of their triumphs, parading the now emancipated revolutionists in pompous formality and forcing the reluctant to hear the history of the causes of it," through mock theatrical representations in mimic composition, as was practiced in Syria the fatherland of Eunus. This practice referred to by Diodorus, "no doubt has reference to the great labor unions called the eranoi, or better, their branch, the thiasoi," a part of whose duty was to provide entertainment for the members. It is known that mimic entertainments of a histrionic character were frequently among the programs of amusement. "There was" says Dr. Bücher, "more than one bitter drop spilled into the bowl of misery at such seiges; since overturned riches, unbridled rapine, purposless power, appeared to gentlemen to be the cause of their destruction; it was in fact, a practical lesson against the will of these compulsory listeners to mimic tragedies, which, like every other lesson where the spirit is against its learning, is fruitless and unheeded." "

¹¹ This fact must be considered as applying to a certain number of freedmen denominated by the modern labor organizations Scabs, who had made themselves obnoxious by an obsequious catering to masters; for we find that a few years later (see Athenion, chapter x.) there were great numbers of free artisans who espoused the cause of the slaves and took up arms gladly in the defense of a common cause.

¹² Bücher, Aufst. S. 66 "Wurde auch einen kleinen Erfolg errungen, im nächsten Augenblicke raffte sich der Aufstand mit doppelter Wuth zusammen und drang unaufhaltsam und grausam, wie alle socialen Kriege, weiter."

¹³ Consult Diod. XXXIV. frag. ii. 45.

The bitter and bloody conflict of this great mutiny of the working people of Sicily had now been raging about 6 years with the prophet of Antioch at its head. The military force of Rome such as she could spare, had been exhausted again and again in efforts to regain her foothold in Sicily, but in vain. The slaves were at last masters of the island. Here, by a most fortunate circumstance, the lacerated history of Diodorus remains so unbroken in this particular link as to explicitly transmit this truth; and in words which cannot well be misunderstood." Diodorus, though his veracity has long lain in abeyance, has outlived his calumniators, and great savants, having proved the truth of statements by his pen which for many centuries lay in ridicule, are now searching for them as being those most valuable in critical use.

Besides the cities mentioned, there were many on the the island which also, one by one, joined the revolutionists. Some of them, it is known, by force. Others offered themselves to the partly through their own wish, partly from a

¹⁷ K. B.

5, Die Dionys. Künstler, Tafeln I-II. Also infra, chap. xvii. infactum Arbeller, S. 67.

[IV. frag. II § 26. "Οὐδέποτε στάσις ἐγένετο τελειωτή βασιλῆος τῆ Σικελίας, δι' ἣν πολλοὶ μὲν πόλεις δουραὶς παρέστησαν συμφοραῖς, πόρῃ καὶ γυναῖκες μὲν ἑαυτῶν ἐπειράθησαν τῶν μεγίστων ἀδὲ ἡ πόλις ἀποδόθηκε πρὸς τὴν εἰς εὐνομίαν ἐπαγγελίαν."

dread of sack and pillage.⁷⁹ Among these were Taormanian and Catana, the place of refuge for the daughter of Damophilus and Megallis. As to Syracuse,⁸⁰ the great and long celebrated capital of Sicily, seat of the former proud tyrants, home of Dion, Plato's friend, and center of the mechanical sciences of Archimides, the city whose hills were quarried and pierced into horrid dungeons—the suffocating latomies, where workingmen by thousands, uncomfortable and forgotten, had worked and smothered for painful centuries to the delight of monsters such as Dionysius;—as to this formidable theatre of the lapicidinae, we are so far informed as to be able to say with a degree of certainty, that also this haughty mistress of the Mediterranean fell before the rebel arms.⁸¹

Messana to the north, had been least abusive to these people when in bondage, and in consequence was spared. Yet even Messana made a strong resistance; for situated on the strait separating Sicily from Italy, an important pivotal position by being almost as much Italian as Sicilian, it at last gave way.⁸²

The capture of this important seaport and stronghold was the immediate cause of the uprising or strike of the slaves and other working people, in large numbers, over on the Italian side, of which we give an account in another place.⁸³

⁷⁹ Strabo. Geog. VI; Diod. frag. II. 20, Orosius, V. 9.

⁸⁰ From Diodorus we have one tattered fragment (II. 9,) which makes it probable that Syracuse also fell into the rebels' grasp.

⁸¹ Elsewhere we have endeavored to show that there existed some unexplained reason for Plato's strange experience among the fishermen of Syracuse and the motives of Dionysius in banishing him thither. Plato was hated by the workmen. The fishermen among whom he was relegated certainly were organized; and they were in sympathy with the mercenary soldiers on strike because Dionysius reduced their pay. We herewith reproduce the words of Dr. Bücher in his text pp. 66-8 and footnote 4: "Eunus war zuletzt fast Herr der ganzen Insel geworden  wahrscheinlich selbst Syrakus &c. Diod. frag. 9: τοῖς καταφαγοῦσι τοὺς ἱερωμένους ἰχθῦς οὐκ ἦν παῦλα τῶν κακῶν. τὸ γὰρ δαιμόνιον ὥσπερ ἐπίτηδες εἰς παραδειγματισμὸν τοῖς ἄλλοις ἅπαντας τοὺς ἀπονεινομένους περιείδεν ἀβοηθήτους. οὗτοι μὲν οὖν ἀκολουθῶς τῇ παρὰ θεῶν κολάσει καὶ τῆς διὰ τῆς ἱστορίας βλασφημίας τετευχότες ἀπέλυσαν τῆς δικαίας ἐπιτιμήσεως. Das Bruchstück gehört hierher schon wegen, er in seiner Nachbarschaft stehen. en fragm. der Exc. Vatic., welche sämtlich auf den Sklavenkrieg Bezug haben. Beiden "heiligen Fischen" kann nur an die der Arethusa auf Oithygia gedacht werden, von welchen Diod. V, 3 Folgendes erzählt: ταύτην (τὴν Ἀρέθουσαν) οὐ μόνον κατὰ τοὺς ἀρχαίους χρόνους ἔχειν μεγάλους καὶ πολλοὺς ἰχθῦς, ἀλλὰ καὶ κατὰ τὴν ἡμετέραν ἡλικίαν συμβαίνει διαμένειν τούτους, ἱεροὺς ὄντας καὶ ἀδίκτους ἀνθρώποις. ἐξ ὧν πολλάκις τινῶν κατὰ τὰς πολεμικὰς περιστάσεις φαγόντων. παραδόξως ἐπεσήμηνε το θεῖον καὶ μεγάλας συμφοραῖς περιεβάλετο τοὺς τολμήσαντας προσενέγκασθαι. περὶ ὧς ἀκρεβῶς ἀναγράφομεν ἐν τοῖς οἰκείοις χρόνοις.

⁸² Orosius, Historiarum Libri Adversus Paganos, V. 6, 9; Julius Obsequens, De Prodigis, I. 1.

⁸³ Consult chapter IX. Infra

The terrible scuffle into which Rome was drawn, during these momentous times, together with the murder of Tiberius Gracchus,* in B. C. 133, show how this mighty people were paralyzed by the labor problem of that century. But with the death of this powerful tribune and faithful friend of the poor, the fortunes of the victorious Eunus crumbled. The real but hidden cause of the comparatively unobstructed career which had now held him king of Sicily fully 10 years, was probably not Rome's inability to cope with him in military force and tactics; it was her social and political demoralization. It was an interregnum of wills;—whether paganism should continue its reckless course against nature, against justice, against human development, and cover the earth with slaves, or whether a revolution against it should, in defiance of its haughty and despotic predilections and unbridled greed, be submitted to. When we look back at the astonishing conquest of Eunus and of his generals and men from this point of view we shall see the waves of the phenomena of Rome's final downfall then and there begun, roll back, together with many another dark political obscurity.

Gracchus was not yet dead, but still in the vortex of his anti-slavery land agitation, spurred on by Blossius his devoted friend. C. Calpurnius Piso was one of the consuls chosen for that year. On him devolved the command in Sicily. He arrived at Messana with a large force and finding it in possession of the slaves, laid siege to the city. After a severe storming the place fell into the hands of the Romans. As many as 8,000 slaves were slain and the prisoners captured were all crucified. Piso was a man of much nerve and business energy, combined with judgment. In addition to this, he must have had a large army. All we possess of the facts are hints touching the main events; the particulars are left to be drawn by inference. Certain it is that his force was large enough to assure him in the bold adventure of attacking Enna; and judging by comparison with the magnitude of the Roman armies afterwards sent to subdue Spartacus,⁸⁶ he could not have had fewer than 75,000 or 100,000 men. Considering the results positively known, it may be no boldness to presume that his army was at least 80,000 strong.

*Plutarch. Tib. Gracchus, 9-14; Appian, De Bellis Civilibus, lib. I. 9: "Μέχρι Τιβέριος Σεμπρώνιος Γράκχος, ἀνὴρ ἐπιφανὴς, καὶ λαμπρὸς ἐς φιλοτιμίαν, εἰπεῖν τε δυνατώτατος, καὶ ἐκ τῶνδε ὁμοῦ πάντων γνωριμώτατος ἅπασιν δημαρχῶν, ἐσεμνολόγησε περὶ τοῦ Ἰταλικοῦ γένους, ὡς εὐπολεμωτάτου τε καὶ συγγενοῦς, φθειρομένου δὲ κατ' ὀλίγον ἐς ἀπορίαν καὶ ὀλιγανδρίαν, καὶ οὐδὲ ἐλπίδα ἔχοντος ἐς διόρθωσιν. Ἐπὶ δὲ τῷ δουλικῷ δυσχεράνας, ὡς ἀστρατεύτῳ, καὶ οὐποτε ἐς δεσπότης πιστῷ, τὸ ἐναγχος ἐπήνεγκεν ἐν Σικελίᾳ δεσποτῶν πάθος ὑπὸ θεραπόντων γινόμενον, ἠϋξήμενων κακείνων ἀπὸ γεωργίας. καὶ τὸν ἐπ' αὐτοὺς Ῥωμαίων πόλεμον, οὐ ῥᾶδιον, οὐδὲ βραχὺν, ἀλλ' ἐς τε μῆκος χρόνον, καὶ τροπὰς κινδύνων ποικίλας ἐκτραπέντα. Ταῦτα δὲ εἰπὼν, ἀνεκαίνιζε τὸν νόμον. Μηδένα τῶν πεντακοσίων πλέθρων πλεονέχειν. Παισὶ δ' αὐτῶν, ὑπὲρ τὸν παλαιὸν νόμον προσετίθει τὰ ἡμίσεα πούτων· καὶ τὴν λοιπὴν, τρεῖν αἰρετοὺς ἀνδρὺς, ἐναλλασσομένους κατ' ἔτος, διανέμειν νοῖς πένησι." Wordsworth. Fragments of Early Latin, p. 221. We have in the preceding chapter, giving an account of the great epidemic of strikes and diseases which were occurring almost everywhere in the Roman territory, caused entirely by a profound and honest dissatisfaction among the laboring people.

The insurrectionary armies on the other hand, were, without doubt, greatly demoralized by their hitherto unfailing successes. They were now no longer slaves, but a host of ignorant and superstitious freedmen regaling unhindered in wantonness and luxury, having had 10 years of security, constantly under the delusion that king Eunus, if not himself an immortal, was at least in daily intercourse with Ceres, whom nobody dared imagine to be less than the powerful protecting goddess of that island. Thus fortified in delusions confirmed, they had in course of these ten years of good fortune, begun to relax their vigilance, leaving to the supernatural, the power which alone their own strong, well-directed arms could accomplish. Things were in consequence, now in perfect readiness for Rome to triumph over the rebellion.

Piso, instead of waiting to skirmish with the generals of Eunus, marched directly to his stronghold. It was a bold strike; and affords us an excellent exhibit of his courage and judgment. He was no communist; and an instance proving this is recorded which clearly shows that socialistic theories were being discussed in those ancient days, by rich and poor: In the fierce struggle which resulted in the murder of the Gracchi, this same Piso said to one of these stanch advocates of the rights of labor, as he railed against the growing spirit of equality threatening extinction to the proud Roman gens and making inroads upon the tribunes and the senate: "It is not with my will and consent that you desire to divide your property; but should you do so I shall demand my share."⁸⁷ The slaves were socialists, enjoying their booty in common; and it could not be expected that any leniency would be shown them by Piso.

⁸⁶ See chapter xl. below.

⁸⁷ Cero Tusculanarum Disputationum Libri III. 20, 48.

According to our authority, Piso, after the capture of Messana, turned his campaign directly toward Eunos' citadel on the heights of Enna. A captain of cavalry led his force too incautiously and got into an ambush laid by the mutineers where he met with some loss in arms, men and horses. Piso singled him out as a coward. He was humiliated, and barefoot and almost naked, obliged to stand before the tent as a watch, forbidden to speak with his comrades or to enjoy his baths. Those left of the defeated cavalry were ordered to give up their horses and go into the company of slingers.⁸⁷ The object of this severe measure was to thoroughly impress the Roman soldiers with the almost deadly results to them, of a failure through disobedience or lack of bravery. On the other hand, both leaders and rank and file were rewarded for an act of valor. Valerius Maximus⁸⁸ also tells a story of Piso's own son, who for having performed some meritorious act in this campaign, was awarded a golden cross weighing three pounds, which he was requested by his father to preserve and wear after he had returned to Rome and it had been publicly presented. This had the effect to fill the minds of all with emulation, adding dash and intrepidity while doubtless dispelling a superstitious fear of the long victorious slaves.

At last the Roman legions arrived before the walls of Enna and immediately laid siege. We are indebted to Dr. Bücher's invaluable dissertation, referring us to Dr. Böckh's inscriptions often used by us; for without his mention we might have missed certain palseographs that shed light upon the otherwise unwritten pages of Piso's siege of Enna.⁸⁹ On the northern steep of the city is a great rock from which the slave women flung headlong the living form of Megallis, wife of Lamophilus.⁹⁰ To ⁸⁷ Valerius Maximus, Fact. Dict. Mem. II. 7 9.

⁸⁸ Id. IV. 3, 11.

⁸⁹ Büch. Aufstände. S. 74, note 1 reads: "Ritchl. P. L. M. VIII. 1: Corp. Inscriptionum Latinarum. (Böckh) [no. 642 sq. vgl. Nitsch a. a. O. Seite 249. Aus dem zweiten Sicilischen Aufstande: Corp. Inscr. Græc. Böckh. No. 5570, 5687, 5748, z. Th. mit dem Namen des Athenion. No. 5548 aus Leontini mit der Aufschrift APAMEO geht vielleicht auf den APAMEER Eunos. Corp. Inscr. Lat. No 646. Sq. stammen wohl aus dem Punicus-krieg." We however subjoin the remark that Diodorus mentions Athenion as having likewise been of Apamea—a point which the learned palseologist may have overlooked.

⁹⁰ See current chapter, page 215

this day there are occasionally found, on and about this rock, balls from the Roman catapults which were hurled at the walls of the beleaguered city during that siege," These relics of Roman projectiles have the name, L. Piso inscribed upon them; as they are found in quantities," the circumstance goes far to attest the prodigious magnitude of the siege, as well as the great length of time that must have been consumed before the place fell into the Roman consul's hands. In fact, it did not fall before the sword of Piso. He was, in some mysterious manner, repulsed; being probably many times attacked and repelled by the sorties of Cleon. At last he is found in the narrative back on the east coast having without a shadow of doubt, been driven there by the slave-king.

In B. C. 132, P. Rupilius was chosen consul at Rome. As just hinted, Piso had met with some unchronicled disaster at the hands of the stubborn rebels of Eunus, who had in their turn, taken the offensive and surged him back to the sea." Rupilius had already held office in Sicily under a joint stock company and had made a large fortune in the capacity of a land speculator. During his official life there he had acquired a good knowledge of the roads and principal objective points of the island." It was this same Rupilius who, with Popilejus Lænus, urged and in some degree consummated the persecutions of Gracchus, whose revival of the ancient Licinian law and whose socialistic oratory had enraged the land and slave-holding aristocracy

" Böckh. C. I. L. nos. 642, & 646? C. I. G. 5570, 5687, 5738; Richtl. Hæmus, VIII. 1. Böckh, C. I. L. 5748 gives the word APAMEO i. e.: 'Eunus of Apamea.' It may mean Athenion of Apamea, however; but both were powerful labor agitators.

" Pliny, N. H. VII. 36; Cic. Tusc. IV. 17, 40; Lacl. 10, 20, 73, 69.

" Büch. Aufst. D. unfr. Arb. S. 73.

" Valerius Maximus, Factorum Dictorumque Memorabilia, lib. VI. 9, 8; Siefert: Erster sicilisch. Sklavenkrieg S. 35, note 57, "Pseudonascon, in Verr. II p. 212; P. Rupilius quondam ex publicano factus consul. Valer. Max. VI. 9, 8 erzählt sogar, dass er ursprünglich, ein Diener der Staatspächter gewesen sei: P. Rupilius non publicanum in Sicilia egit, sed operas publicanis dedit. Idem ultimam inopiam suam, auctoritate sociis officio, sustinuit — Er war ein Freund des jüngern Scipio Cic. Lael. 19. Als Consul führte er zu Anfang seines Amtsjahres mit seinem Collegen Popillius Laenas die Untersuchung gegen die Mitschuldigen des Tib. Gracchus (Cic. Lael. 11, Val. Max. IV. 7, 1). Nach Vellei. Pat. II, 7 wurde er wegen der Strenge, mit welcher diese Untersuchung geführt wurde, gleich Popillius vor Gericht gezogen, während andere Schriftsteller nur von der Verfolgung des Letztern durch C. Gracchus sprechen. Vgl. Pauly's RE. V. 1900. Er endete später plötzlich aus Aerger und Schreck über die misslungene Bewerbung seines Bruders um das Consulat. Cic. Tusc. IV, 17. Irrthümlich nennt übrigens Florus III, 19 den Perperna als den Besieger der Sklaven."

of Rome to a high pitch and caused his murder by a mob of the nobility the year before, while Piso was vainly besieging Eunus at Enna. Such a man would therefore, naturally be selected by them as a proper person to confide in; ⁹⁵ he sent to quell the great uprising of their chattels in Sicily. It does not appear however, that Rupilius assumed command of Piso's army immediately on his election to the consulship. But that he superseded him ⁹⁶ is certain; for his trouble with the unreliableness of his own troops is spoken of by a number of the old writers. ⁹⁷ A son-in-law of Rupilius, Q. Fabius, commander-in-chief of a division of Piso's army, had been defeated at Tauromanion on the eastern coast of Sicily, losing the citadel, a stronghold of much value. This had proved a triumph to the revolutionists. But it appears to have been re-taken by Piso in some subsequent struggle. ⁹⁷

Rupilius on assuming command, found Tauromanion again in the possession of Cleon and Eunus. As a punishment, Fabius was deprived of his command and compelled to quit the island. Rupilius then resolved to lay siege to Tauromanion. The besieged fought desperately and by an exhibit of courage and impetuosity threw back the Roman forces, driving them into a corner. Still Rupilius was not overcome. Rallying, he attacked the defenses of the slaves and checked their opportunity to do great damage. He then closed them in and began the process of starvation with all the malignant obstinacy of a Roman warrior. How long the siege lasted is not quite apparent; but in time, the provisions began to disappear. Hunger at last made its gaunt and ghastly tread into the abodes of the besieged, turning brave men into cannibals and making life a lottery by adding a horror of the carnivore to the pang of death. The poor wretches first attacked their own children and devoured their flesh; and then with the true beastliness of the gunæcophage, they

⁹⁵ Büch. S. 74.

⁹⁶ Valer. Max. VI 9, 8.

⁹⁷ Diod. frag. ii. § 20.

⁹⁸ Valer. Max. IX. 12; Oros. V. 9; Flor. III. 19.

⁹⁷ Id V. 11, 7, 8; Flor. III. 19.

Diod. XXXIV. frag. ii. 20. Κατὰ δὲ Σικελίαν ἤρξετο τὸ κακόν, καὶ πόλεις ἡλίσκοντο αὐτάνδρῳ καὶ πολλὰ στρατόπεδα ὑπὸ τῶν ἀποστατῶν κατεκόπησαν, ἕως Ῥουπίλιος ὁ Ῥωμαίων στρατηγὸς τὸ Ταυρομένιον ἀνεσώσατο Ῥωμαίοις, καρτερῶς μὲν αὐτὸ πολιορκήσας, καὶ εἰς ἄφατον ἀνάγκην καὶ λιμὸν τοὺς ἀποστάτας συγκλείσας, ὥστε ὀρξαμένους ἐκ ποίδων βορᾶς καὶ διελθόντας διὰ γυναικῶν μηδὲ τῆς αὐτῶν ὀλληλοφαγίας, μὲν δ' ὅλως φείσασθαι.

sated their wolfish appetites on the flesh and the innocent blood of women and other adults who could not fight."

Tauromanion was commanded by Cleon's brother, Comanus. In a moment of extreme desperation the latter, half dead with the grip of famine made an attempt to escape. He was however, detected issuing from the walls of the doomed city. Arrested and led before his hated enemy, the inexorable Rupilius, he was questioned regarding the power of his comrades within the fortifications, their objects and hopes of escape. The hour of the bold man of terrors had come. Never deigning an answer, with an almost unheard-of force of will, the man, after a wild moment's pause and a withering stare, covered his head with his mantle, drew in his breath, and by a superhuman struggle at self-command, refused to breathe again, dying amidst and before the astonished gaze of, Rupilius and his guards!"

Finally the Romans succeeded in battering through the lower wall a gap and thus forced an entrance. But there yet remained an excellent and almost impregnable citadel into which the besieged took refuge as the Romans entered the breach. Here again they safely held themselves for a time, until through a treachery of one of the commanders, the Romans were admitted.

The scene which followed must be imagined; it cannot be described. With a spirit of relentless vengeance Rupilius tied the helpless, writhing prisoners fast, until his soldiers could have time to erect a multitude of gibbets; then in the frightful manner of all Roman criminals and the proletarian outcasts, they were hung upon the ignominious cross. Afterwards their bodies were hurled down all precipices which formed an escarpment of the citadel.¹⁰⁰ Little indeed is preserved of this awful martyrdom but a variety of broken gems corresponding with the main body of our narrative, are extant, which leave us the conjecture that its language falls short of the ghastly truth.

It is fair here to state on the other hand that a similar cruelty and want of feeling characterized the men in rebellion. Their vote at the first deliberative council de-declaring for the butcher-knife policy was an edict, inhuman and unworthy of a cause so exalted as that of freedom. Nor do we, except under the sagacious Achæus, find that they ever deviated from this cruel and almost internecine policy, which may have tended to harden the spirit in Rupilius, of revenge, retaliation and ferocity.

⁹⁹ Diod. frag. li. § 20; Oros. V. 9.

¹⁰⁰ Val. Max. IX. 12, exc. 1.

¹⁰⁰ Compare Siefert, S. 22 with Bücher, S. 75.

Rupilius, having now partially quenched a blood-thirsting spirit on these victims, marched directly for Enna. On his arrival he found the place an almost natural fortress, as difficult to storm as Tauromanion. Upon one side a similar precipice formed a natural wall, impregnable under any assault. The only thing practicable was to besiege the place, wait until the enemy's stores gave out and apply for a second time, the process of starvation. Cleon, the hitherto unconquerable commander-in-chief, held the fort. Eunus and his retinue had also gone back thither, before the siege of Tauromanion opened. Achæus is lost sight of. He is mentioned as dead; but from what cause is unknown. Comanus had fallen at Tauromanion. At the siege, there frequently occurred sorties of bodies of volunteers who would sometimes dash with precipitation from within the walls, cutting, wounding and taking prisoners, numbers often of the consul's best men. In one of these sallies Cleon, the intrepid chief, now mainstay of the already worn out and fainting slaves, was the leader in person. The number of the party this time proved insufficient to cope with the force which Rupilius detailed against them and in an effort to extricate them from the peril Cleon himself, in a hand to hand conflict, fell mortally wounded, a prisoner of the Romans, and expired.

When the news of the death of this loved and trusted leader came to the ears of Eunus and his people, a general gloom overspread the city. Courage was shattered. The king himself lost hope. His faith forsook him and he shrank in horror and despair. Now followed the work of that perfidious, cruel, with ancient workingmen's organizations, ever-present pest, the traitor. As at Setia, at Sunion, at Tauromanion, so here at Enna, this dangerous gorgon of insidiousness and villainy was at his post with fair words and foul intrigue ready to work his deadly poison for the enemy and against a friend and thus the keys to the gates of the city were soon after the death of Cleon, delivered to the workingmen's implacable foe. Enna fell into the hands of the Romans.

The wholesale slaughter of the people, all of whom were captured, is an untraced horror. All that we are told by the hints left in fragments of its historians and seen in later commentaries, is that 20,000 of them, including the catastrophe of Tauromanion, bit the dust. The multitude of soldiers, of the aged, of women and children who suffered by sword and cross in other parts of Sicily, may be easily imagined. But at Enna the crucifix for weeks was a busy demon of retribution. A sullen gleam of joy seems to have lit the workers of revenge and to have made the glare of the firebrands of torture and the sobs and moans of the helpless in their hour of agony so cruelly prolonged, moments of a true elysium to the maddened aristocracy with souls steeped in competition, whose glaives wreaked as they slashed from heart to heart of these vanquished representatives of labor.¹⁰¹

Eunus who had, during his day of fortune, given himself up to luxury and perhaps gluttony, had probably become demoralized and with him many others.¹⁰² A whole people, suddenly changed from abject slavery and degradation into affluence, becomes in turn, the arrogant master, the owner, lord; and enters and occupies a condition utterly unnatural to their expectations, however well it may conform to their tastes. The result is voluptuousness and degeneracy. The ten years' uninterrupted reign of Eunus may have resulted in jealousies and internal distempers. How Achæus came to his end is unknown; but suspicion points to some fatal feud between him and Cleon.

The great army of 200,000 soldiers¹⁰³ at the time of the junction of Achæus and Cleon is no longer in view upon the arrival of Piso and the first siege of Enna. Where were these legions, invincible at the outbreak of the war? What had occurred in the meanwhile?

Eunus lost all hope and courage at the death of Cleon; and as Rupilius entered, shrank from his kingly seat and fled with a thousand guards, equally bereft of courage, hoping to escape to an inaccessible cleft or hiding place in the mountain. This rift of rocks with its trembling contents was soon discovered by a straggling party of Roman troops. Physical force was at an end and the omnipotent powers of the humiliated prophet were now all that his adherents had to fall back upon for succor. The Romans approached and commenced furiously the work of arrest. Seeing that the goddess had withdrawn her arm of protection, the guards of Eunus, rather than suffer the horrors of the cruel and ignominious crucifixion, fell to mutual extermination and by a desperate inter-suicide, robbed the gibbet of its prey. Eunus with his cook, his baker, his bath attendant and "king's fool,"¹⁰⁴ having no courage for mutual self-destruction, hid in a deep crevice of the crag. Thither the inexorable Romans followed and dragged them out. They then hung his kitchen mates upon a cross.

¹⁰¹ Siefert, 22: "Die Sklaven wurden unter Martern getödtet, meist von den hohen Felsen gestürzt. Auch hier (bei Henna) wurden Tausende niedergehauen; die Gesamtzahl der in Tauromanion und Henna getödteten Sklaven betrug über zwanzigtausend."

¹⁰² Büch. S. 76.
¹⁰³ Diod. XXXIV. frag. ii; Siefert, S. 29; Büch. S. 65. Bücher and Siefert are agreed in putting the number at 200,000. Livy, Cleon alone, 70,000.

As to Eunus, he was first taken to the dungeon of Morgantion, under guard; afterwards, according to Plutarch, to Rome, (probably the carcer Tullianus, or one of the underground Mamertine caves) where in excruciating misery, covered with vermin and seething in filth, darkness and terror, he ended his extraordinary life.¹⁰⁵

Rupilius was a man too thorough to leave his work unfinished. He sent powerful detachments into every part of Sicily wherever his scouts brought intelligence of any group of rebels still at large. Great numbers of them were seized, brought into head-quarters and thence taken to the many Dionysian quarries or lapicidinae, dungeons for which Sicily was famous, and those found guilty of direct participation in the uprising were crucified. But these latter were the most numerous share. All the rest were re-delivered to their masters to receive worse treatment than before.

¹⁰⁴ Diod. XXXIV. frag. ii. 22.

¹⁰⁵ Diod. XXXIV. frag. ii. 23. Dind. "Καὶ παραδοθεὶς εἰς φυλακὴν, καὶ τοῦ σώματος αὐτοῦ διαλυθέντος εἰς φθειρῶν πλῆθος, οἰκείως τῆς περὶ αὐτὸν ῥαδιουργίας κατέστρεψε τὸν βίον ἐν τῇ Μοργαντίων;" Livy. Epit. XC: "Capitur, carceris a pediculis devoratur;" Plutarch, in Life of Sylla. 37, says; "This disease," speaking of Sylla, "corrupted his flesh turning it all into lice."  "We are told that among the ancients, Acastus, son of Pallas, died of this sickness; and of those that come nearer our times, Armen the poet, Phryges the divine, Callisthenes the Olynthian who was kept in close prison, and Mucius the lawyer. And after these we may take notice of a man who did not distinguish himself by anything laudable, but was noted in another way, it may be mentioned that the fugitive slave Eunus, who kindled up the servile war in Sicily and was afterwards taken and carried to Rome, died there of this disease;" Siefert 22 "Mit 4 seiner Diener, dem Koch, dem Bäcker, dem Badesklaven und dem Lustigmacher ward er in einer Höhle gefangen. Er starb im Gefängnisse an der Läusekrankheit entweder zu Morgantion oder Rom." According to Prudentius (Hymn V.) the ancient cavern prisons were constructed with an object to produce as much torture as possible. Other ancient authors agree in conveying the idea that human ingenuity was taxed to invent such bells.

Such was the first servile war in Sicily; the greatest labor rebellion or strike, on record in any country or at any time. It was a most suggestive matter; being inspired by, based upon, animated, from its inception and all through by grievances against the conditions regulating labor and relying upon the superstitious idea of a Messiah, fervently believed, among the ancient poor, to be their promised deliverer.

CHAPTER X.

ARISTONICUS.

A BLOODY STRIKE IN ASIA MINOR.

FREEDMEN, BONDSMEN, TRAMPS and Illegitimates Rise against Oppression—Contagion of monster Strikes—Again the Irascible Plan of Rescue tried—Aristonicus of Pergamus—Story of the Murder of Titus Gracchus and of 300 Land Reformers by a Mob of Nobles at Rome—Blossius, a Noble, Espouses the Cause of the Workingmen—He goes to Pergamus—The Heliopolitai—The Commander of the Labor Army overpowers all Resistance—Battle of Leuca—Overthrow of the Romans—Death of Crassus—Arrival of the Consul Paperna—Defeat of the Insurgents—Their Punishment—Discouragement and Suicide—Aristonicus strangled, Thousands crucified and the Cause Lost—Old Authors Quoted.

THE great uprising or strike, partly of slaves and partly of freedmen, artisans and farmers at Pergamus and in its vicinity, was to some extent the result of the abortive slave revolution in Sicily just described. It is interesting to the student of sociology, but especially so to the student of social life in antiquity, in many respects, if for no other reason than that it occurred but a short distance from Palestine with its Nazareth, its Jerusalem, its thousand memorable scenes that 163–166 years afterwards cradled and founded the mightier, more imperishable revolution of Christianity which aimed the final blow at slavery.

Pergamus, on the river Guicus, was, at the time of this story, a beautiful city, already ancient in years and vicissitudes. Attalus III., a son of Eumenes, a freaky, cruel and jealous monarch, ruled the place from B. C. 138 to 133, when at his death he transferred it without a contest to the Romans; so that it was a Roman possession when our story begins. The official news of this testament of Attalus was delivered to the delighted Roman Senate in the early fall of B. C. 133. There had been a great turmoil in Rome, occasioned by the abortive attempt of Titus Gracchus to restore the Licinian law, making it a crime for any person to hold more than 500 acres of land. The entire aristocracy had combined with the most unscrupulous and desperate resistance against Gracchus; and that same year had murdered him for daring to propose a measure which might curtail their arrogant and altogether illegal seizure and appropriation of the public domain, ager publicus; thus building up a landed aristocracy. The poor people, freedmen and slaves, had been intensely interested in the results of the commotion, which in the assassination of Gracchus by the lords and the overthrow of his noble measure, had been a disaster to them. Finally the defeat of Eunos and his army of revolutionists in Sicily, at that moment accomplished by Rupilius, added to the woe of the entire plebeian class. But now, as if this misfortune was not enough to fill their cup of bitterness, the news arrives from Asia Minor, a country in which the trade and labor unions were more splendidly organized than almost any other part of the world,¹ that Pergamus and the whole rich province of Eumenes and his successors, was, without a struggle, turned over to the greedy Romans, with its beautiful and fertile valleys of the Guicus and tributaries, to become the scene of human slavery and its extended horrors. Already this terrible institution was planted there, competing with free labor. But this free labor is proved by the inscriptions to have been so well organized and so self-sustaining that it could exist under almost any government except that of the conquering, trampling Romans. The news, then, that Pergamus had been deeded to Rome, without even consulting her people, was a mournful shadow which the proletarian class, if we judge by what followed, certainly interpreted to mean the doom of liberty and organization. Plutarch thinks that human slavery and its booty had much to do with this strange transaction, which afforded Gracchus a chance to argue for an immediate distribution of money and lands, left in the testament of the dead king, among the poor, under this new agrarian measure which had actually passed and become a law.³ Of course such a proposition only exasperated the Roman lords to the frenzy which burst into a tumultuous mob and ended in that eloquent, well-meaning tribune's violent death, followed by a great insurrection or mob of the Roman lords and the murder of over 300 work people at Rome. There has been considerable comment by the historians and others, as to the legality of the testament of Attalus,⁴ who at the time of his death is thought by his strange conduct to have been insane.

¹ See chapters xix. and xxi.

Attalus had a half brother named Aristonicus, a natural son of Eumenes by a woman of the place who was a daughter of a musician whom probably the royal family had employed. According to a clause in the law of succession it appears that this person, now a strong, ambitious and vigorous man, was the real heir apparent to the throne, although only half noble and the other half plebeian by birth. He certainly submitted with a bad grace to the arbitrary testament of the dead king, which, it was suspected, had been accomplished through intriguing Roman lawyers often seen hovering about the palace.⁴ Aristonicus entered his claim to the throne immediately after the tyrant's death. He entered into the new project with energy. Nor was he without friends. The largest part of the kingdom favored his pretention. There were many cities of some dimensions lying in the valleys of the river Guicus and its tributaries, nearly all of which determined for him from the start as their future king. By the appearance of things Aristonicus was not only one of the common people but very popular among them. Like the rest, he was a castaway. Rome haughtily refused to recognize his claim. A number of cities like Colophon, Myndum, and thickly populated places as Samos, even if they wished to side with him, were afraid of the Romans. To secure them it was necessary to use armed force. Aristonicus soon found himself at the head of a considerable army and also a little navy consisting of a number of ships. From the palace he had obtained some money and with it he hired Thracian freedmen as mercenaries, a common practice of those times. Besides these, many of the soldiers were those who formerly had done duty for his brother.

³ Plutarch, Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus, 14, Oros. V. 8. Gracchus had not met his fate when Eudamus delivered the testament of Attalus to the Romans.

⁴ Livy, Epitom. LVIII., LVIX., which give us enough to show that Livy also wrote the history of this great mutiny which he calls a bellum servile. Oros. V. 8, 10. Strabo, XIII. Sallust, IV, Historiarum Populi Romani Libri, fragments "Eumenem, cujus amicitiam gloriose ostendant. initio prodidere Antiocho paci. mercedem; post Attalum custodem agri captivi sumtibus et contumeliis ex rege miserrimum servorum effecere: simulatoque impio testamento, filium ejus Aristonicum, quia patrium regnum petiverat, hostium more per triumphum duxere: Asia ab ipsis obsessa est: postremo totam Bithyniam, Nicomede mortuo, diripere, cum filius Nussæ, quam reginam appellaverant, genitus hand dubie esset." Büch. Aufs. S. 103.

⁴ Diod. XXXIV., frags. II. and III, Oros. V. 10. Strabo, XIV. p. 646. Polyb. XXX. 2

The Ephesians, seeing the turn things were taking sent a fleet against him which completely destroyed his little squadron near the coast opposite Cyme. Aristonicus now determined to depend upon trying his fortunes by land.

Great numbers of slaves having heard of the success of Eunus in Sicily, and fearing, as well they might, that the occupation of Pergamus by the Romans would result in their worse degradation, were ready to welcome the new adventurer. The organized freedmen had cause for still greater fears. It was at the commencement of those days of persecution of trade unions by the Romans which culminated B. C. 58, in a law for their suppression.⁵ The workingmen of antiquity possessed means of conveying intelligence of their hopes, fears and methods from one center or post to another; and it is ascertained that in this war of the pretender to the throne of Pergamus, large numbers, not only of slaves, but also of freedmen joined his army, although it was always known as the servile war.

In the interior he found the slaves already in rebellion. They had raised in a great insurrection, murdered their masters, taken possession of their estates⁶ and were organizing an army when Aristonicus appeared before them making overtures for their mutual assistance. He offered them their freedom and a respectable place in the army. He promised them that on the result of success he would build up a state based on their ideal of freedom and equality as had been advocated in the meetings of the unions.

⁵ See chaps. xli to xlviii, containing full accounts with foot notes of proof reference.

⁶ D. od. XXXIV, frag. iii.

The eranoi and *thiasoi*⁷ existed in great numbers on this coast of Asia Minor, especially at Cyne, Pergamón and Samos. These, in common with those in Greece, Syria, and the islands, had established a culture of democracy. The promise made to these confiding people was that they should have the enjoyment of their rights guaranteed them and should be made full citizens; their state which the new monarch was to govern for them was to be the "sun" among nations and they were to be the ennobled, dazzling citizens of the sun, Heliopolitai. Such a condition bespoke almost the opposite of what they had ever seen in human government. The old groundwork of Greek government was one of lordship and bondsmen, dividing mankind by a gap so wide that it could scarcely be passed by leaps of fortune or aptitude. Yet they seem to have been able to comprehend the force of these promises. The discussions they had previously had in their societies had prepared them to receive and appreciate the promise. On the other hand they were to work with an obedient will and help the new king to establish himself on the throne. Dr. Bücher⁸ points out that the dazzling idea of becoming such citizens of the sun was what enraptured and won the slaves of Enna and all Sicily over to Eumus during the great servile war. The more ancient Syrian religion had been that of sun-worship, and their sun-god was equivalent in power and importance to the Greek Jove.⁹ The Syrians had an idea that their sun-worship was done to a sun-god and goddess; the god being equal to Jupiter and the goddess to Demeter or Ceres. So we hear of Eumus pretending to be the chosen representative of Ceres, who made the sun warm the fruits of the earth. Like the Greek gods who dwelt on the height of Olympus the ouranos or vaulted dome of heaven, so Adad and Atargatis, the sun-god and goddess of the Syrians,¹⁰ had their celestial home on the plateau eminence between the twin mountains of Lebanon, at the source of the Orontes, whose waters swept the foot of Antioch. Sun and earth

⁷ For eranos and thiasos, the ancient Greek-speaking labor unions, see chap. xix. infra.

⁸ Aufstände der Unfreien Arbeiter, S. 106. "Der name der Heliopoliten, weist darauf hin, dass es derselbe war durch welchen Eumus seine Syrer fanatisirte."

⁹ Macrobius Saturnaliorum Libri, I, 13, 10, Eyssenhardt, 1868: "Assyri quoque solem sub nomine Jovis, quem Δία Ἡλιουπολίτην cognominant, maximis ceremoniis celebrant in civitate quæ Heliopolis nuncupatur."

¹⁰ Strabo XII.

are within their power which is all that is glory, goodness and light. Thus these poor enslaved beings, stunted by hard labor and sufferings, either as slaves under the master's lash or as freedmen whose organizations are threatened or broken up, and whose business is lost—they being already in a state of insurrection—quickly grasped the offer of Aristonicus and became his soldiers.

Thus began another great strike or uprising of the labor-class; this time in far off Asia Minor, that was destined to add one more link to the already immense concatenation of circumstances leading to the great revolution of Jesus. But it may be looked upon as a most necessary thing in the stubborn logic of a flat, in order that mankind might be taught the utter fallacy of any vengeful policy based upon the purely irascible, combating the acquisitive or concupiscent impulses of human nature.

Aristonicus began the war with slaves and freedmen as soldiers, in a manner similar to that of Eunus. His object was to become a king over a socialistic state. We are not aware of the number of cities that refused him, but it must have been considerable.¹¹ These he stormed and on forcing an entrance, plundered and treated with cruelty. The first city taken was Thyratira; the next Apollonis—large towns built by the Atalæ and Seleucidæ.

Conquest followed and city after city fell into the hands of the pretender and his rebel army. This successful campaign continued until we find them in possession of the entire kingdom. Nothing is imparted to us in regard to whether the neighboring slaves rebelled against their masters, in imitation of these proceedings at Pergamus.

At Rome, little or nothing was done during the year B. C. 133–132, to quell the new uprising in Asia. The great city was still trembling midst the cyclonic billows of the Gracchan revolt. The new servile wars at Rome and Capua, excited to a high pitch by the affair of Gracchus and his agrarian law was a dangerous rekindling of the war of Eunus. Titus Gracchus during this period was assassinated, as we shall soon relate, and a large detachment of the Roman army was still absent in Sicily under Rupilius, putting down the immense social upheaval recounted in the preceding chapter.

¹¹ Sallust wrote a full history of the war but his details are all gone. Nothing of his valuable history remains except fragments, some of them so broken as to contain only half a line.

Thus, for a short time Rome had no time to turn attention toward her new territory of Pergamus bequeathed her by Attalus III. When the news, however, reached the city that the pretender was earnestly and successfully making headway and with the armed proletaries, rapidly achieving their object, the Romans awoke to a realization of the truth. But wherever the promise of booty showed itself they were seldom known to lie negligent or apathetic.

The two consuls for the year 131 were P. Licinius Crassus Mucianus and L. Valerius Flaccus. According to an old usage, Licinius Crassus was the Pontifex Maximus, and as such, through a religious superstition, could not leave Italy. Pagan religion also interposed against the other consul taking the field; he being Flamen Martialis to his colleague. There arose a dispute among the senators, and the illustrious name of Scipio Africanus was brought up for the general command of the expedition. But this plan was rejected and it was at last resolved to send Crassus, who had been one of the ardent friends of Gracchus and his land reform, and for this reason was beloved by the common people. Another reason for preferring him for the command of the expedition was, that he was not only master of the Greek but also spoke its Asiatic dialects; and having exhibited talent as an orator, he was believed to possess a variety of abilities necessary to insure success.¹²

He set sail from Rome during the early part of the year, with his whole army and the navy constituting in all a large force, and with a prosperous voyage on the Mediterranean arrived safely in the harbor of Pergamus.¹³ He had no other idea than to make himself master of the new legacy of Pergamus; for it does not appear, because he sympathized with Gracchus and the Italian proletariat, that he even understood or cared in the least, for an almost exactly similar state of suffering and somewhat similar movement in Asia. The question of sympathy with the poor seems to illy befit the objects of the commander of the expedition against Aristonicus. It would seem that the impulses of tenderness he had manifested for Gracchus and the Italian poor and his rising power shown by his election might have played a deal in deciding upon Crassus against Scipio to get him out of the way.

¹² Valerius Maximus VIII. 7, 6: "Jam H. Crassus, cum in Asiam ad Aristonicum regem debellandum consul venisset, tanta cura Græcæ linguæ notitiam animo comprehendit, ut eam in quinque divisam genera per omnes partes ac numeros penitus cognosceret. Quæ res maximum ei sociorum amorem conciliavit, qua quis eorum lingua apud tribunal illius postulaverat, eadem decreta reddenti." Cic. Phil. XI, 8, 18.

¹³ Gell. I. 13, 11.

On landing, Crassus had interviews with Nicomedes, king of Bithynia; Mithradates, king of Pontus; Ariarthes, king of Cappadocia and Pylæmenes of Paphlagonia; all of whom were seriously alarmed about the labor agitation, expecting similar uprisings would take place in their own territories; and they were probably trembling in view of the danger. They all eagerly joined with the Romans in their effort to put down the rebels. Each pledged himself to contribute a strong force of troops.

On the other hand, Aristonicus, in addition to his proletaries, had also engaged another body of soldiers, consisting of Thracian mercenaries. Phocæa, one of the finest cities supported him and many others staked their interests in him. But his best piece of fortune was meeting with Blossius of Cumæ, a stoic, who infused with the spirit of the movement of Gracchus and also of Eunus of Sicily, had risen in Asia Minor as advocate of the rights of mankind and become a social reformer.¹⁴ Plutarch tells the full story of Blossius. We reproduce his and other points.

A man named Blossius from the Italian municipium of Cumæ, subject to Rome, who, it appears, was an educated patrician, for some cause unexplained became greatly charmed by the majestic eloquence of Gracchus and his extraordinary defense of the poor working population of Italy. What inspired him to it may be conjectured to have existed in some degree independently of an enthusiasm for one man. The city of Cumæ was itself a home of labor unions.¹⁵ It was about that time also that persecutions, frowns and threats had set in against labor organizations of every kind. Roman aristocracy had lived to see the steady growth of human liberty and was shrewd enough to perceive that trade unionism was a potent factor in its promotion. Labor unions took a political shape notwithstanding the severe laws against them. To head off these tendencies of organized labor, existing not only in Cumæ but everywhere, the Roman lords were combined almost to a man, heart and soul and with malignant determination, to destroy them. To do this the more effectually they appealed to the avaricious instincts of the so-called citizen class, portraying the immense individual wealth which might be developed from the great accessions of stock and farm lands falling to the Roman arms through conquest. This wealth was already in many places being realized and the power to be used for its development was human slavery. The slave power was the muscle of the subjugated tillers of the land. But to accomplish this there must be rigorous laws for suppressing free labor. Gracchus, who had seen the horrors of slavery in Etruria while once traveling through that country on business, had determined to devote his life to the rescue of the slaves and threatened freedmen. Blossius saw him and they became intimate friends.

¹⁴ Plutarch, Tiberius Gracchus, 17, 20; Valerius Maximus, IV. 7, 1; Cicero, Lat., 11, 37.

¹⁵ Orellius, Inscriptionum Latinarum Collectio, Nos. 2,263, 6,422, 6,463, 5,158, 131. These figures refer to slabs of stone on which are found inscribed the registers of collegii or trade unions. Cumæ must have been a hive of unions at that time.

On the morning of the fatal patrician mob, "Gracchus," says Plutarch, "who was a grandson of Scipio Africanus, set off for the Forum of Rome when he heard that the populace were gathering there; but not without a presentiment of ill omen. A brace of snakes had laid eggs in his highly ornamented helmet. The chickens from whose entrails the crusper was to foreshadow his augury, refused to come from their coop and eat. Two black ravens were seen fighting on the roof of a house and one of them rattled a stone down at his feet."¹⁶ All these were bad omens¹⁷ which to those superstitious people proved so disastrous by prostrating their faith, hopes and consciences in many an hour of trial and caused disasters more terrible than their enemies themselves. The boldest of the comrades of Gracchus were staggered. Further than this, when he left the threshold of his home, Gracchus had stumbled and hurt his toe so badly that it bled profusely. Blossius was with him, and it seems was the spokesman of the train.

Gracchus, like many another leader among the ancients, shrank at this array of ill omens, but Blossius dissuaded him from his timid design of returning by the following persuasive speech: "For Tiberius Gracchus, grandson of Scipio Africanus and tribune of the Romans, to be scared at a crow, and disappoint the people who are assembled to receive his aid, would be an unendurable disgrace. His enemies would not alone laugh at such a blunder but they would malign him to the common people as an insolent tyrant," Friends also now came to herald the fact that a great number of people were gathering and were impatient of his arrival and that all was calm.

¹⁶ Plutarch, Titus Gracchus.

¹⁷ Fustel de Coulanges, Cité Antique, is the best work we can refer to for an explanation of the influence of superstitions in ancient times. For the superstitions themselves, see Julius Obsequens, de Predigiis, passim.

The outcome of it was that Gracchus yielded, but was soon beset by one of those terrible mobs of Roman nobles and their hirelings, denounced as an ambitious schemer who wanted nothing but the votes and support of the rabble and intended to make himself tyrant of Rome. They set upon the defenceless man and murdered him with kicks and clubs.

So great was the faith of Blossius in Gracchus that when afterwards asked if he would have burned the capitol had he been commanded by him to do so, he replied that Gracchus was too wise to have made such a command, but supplemented it when pressed with the daring answer that he should have obeyed.¹⁸ Blossius, notwithstanding the treason, escaped and was not pursued, probably because he was thought to be infatuated. He now bent his course toward Asia Minor¹⁹ and joined his learning and influence to the insurrection of the freedmen and slaves, under the leadership of Aristonicus.

We now return to the career of Publius Crassus, a relative of the Gracchi—Caius, the brother of Tiberius Gracchus, having married his daughter Licinia. As mentioned, he had no sympathy whatever with the emancipation movement which was then raging over the known world, excepting so far as that of Rome proper was concerned. He landed at or near Pergamus and formed an alliance with the princes of the Pergamenian kingdom and the kings of Bithynia, Pontus, Cappadocia and Paphlagonia, engaged as many native soldiers as possible and with his own army and the auxiliaries, made an assault upon Leucæ, a strongly fortified city. A protracted siege must have followed; for he was there fighting in the following winter, when his consulship had nearly expired. He was laying his plans to leave for Rome when entrapped and surprised by the arrival of heavy reinforcements for Aristonicus. Crassus was forced to give battle and was totally defeated. He was himself surrounded by the enemy and taken prisoner. Treated no doubt, with severity, and discouraged if not distracted, he sought death rather than disgrace; and one day, infuriating one of the Thracian mercenaries by a punch in the eye with his riding whip, the latter plunged his sword through his body and killed him on the spot.²⁰ The head of the dead Roman general was cut off and the body taken to Smyrna and buried.

¹⁸ Cicero, Lælius, II, makes this account almost exactly similar with that of Plutarch, or of Valerius Maximus De Amicitia, VIII. vii 1; "Nam cum senatus Rupillia ac Lænati consulibus mandasset, ut in eos qui cum Graccho consenserant, more majorum animadverterent; et ad Lælium, cujus consilio præcique consules urbebantur, pro se Blossius deprecatum venisset, familiaritatisque excusatione uteretur, atque is dixisset. Quid site Gracchus templo Jovis Opt. Max. faces subdere jussisset; obsecuturusne voluntati illius, propter istam quam jactas familiaritatem, fuses? Nunquam istud, inquit, Gracchus imperasset. Satis, imo etiam nimium; totius namque senatus consensu damnatos mores defendere ausus est. Verum quod sequitur, multo audacius, multoque periculosius; compressus enim perseveranti interrogatione Lælii, in eodem constantis gradu stetit: seque etiam hoc, si modo Gracchus annuisset, facturum respondit.

¹⁹ Valerius Maximus, idem note of Thyss. "Tiberium et Caium, fratres, ob gravissimas seditiones, quas in podulo suis legibus excitabant, nostes à Senatu fuisse indicatos, and utcumque à nobilitate cæsum, alterum à Nasico, alterum ab Opimio. Quo tandem cæso, Blossius ad Aristonicum regem confugit. Profligatis deinde rebus Aristonici, mortem sibi concevit."

In the meantime, at the comitia at Rome, M. Paperna had been elected one of the new consuls for the year 130. The news of the turn of military things in Asia Minor cast an alarm at the home government and Paperna was fitted out and soon on his way with an army large enough to crush the forces of Aristonicus at a blow. Arrived in Mysia and receiving the particulars of the disaster of Crassus at Leucæ he betook himself to the spot where the slaughter occurred. The time of year when he arrived must have been March or late in February; for Aristonicus was yet at winter quarters.

Before the latter could prepare himself for resistance, Paperna fell upon him by surprise. A great battle ensued in which Aristonicus was totally overthrown. With the shattered remnant of his army he fled to Stratonicæ but was doggedly followed by the Romans who surrounded the place and starved him to a capitulation. With most of the slaves he fell a prisoner to the Romans.

²⁰ Valerius Maximus, III. ii. 12, De Fortitudine: "Militis hujus in adverso casu tam egregius tamque virilis animus, quam relaturus sum imperatoris. P. enim Crassus cum Aristonico bellum in Asia gerens, à Thracibus, quorum is magnum in præsidio habebat, inter Eleam et Smyrnæ exceptus, ne in ditionem ejus perveniret; dedecus, accersita ratione mortis, effugit. Virgam enim, qua ad regendum equum usus fuerat, in unius barbari oculum direxit. Qui vi doloris accensus, latus Crassi sica confodit: dumque se ulciscitur, Romanum imperatorem majestatis amissæ turpitudine liberavit. Ostendit fortunæ Crassus, quam indignum virum tam gravi contumelia afficere voluisset; quoniam quidem injectos ab ea libertati suæ miserabiles laqueos prudenter partier ac fortiter rupit, datumque se jam Aristonico, dignitati suæ reddidit." Cic. Legg. III. 19, 42: Strabo XII.

Paperna's time being about to expire—the manœuvres, cross marching and other vicissitudes of the campaign having absorbed the summer—Aristonicus, with a portion of his rebel soldiers and officers, was conveyed back in irons to Pergamus. Paperna pressed his design to take his distinguished prisoner, as well as the Pergamenian treasure bequeathed by Attalus III, back to Rome, before the arrival of the new consul should deprive him of his laurels; since it was often the habit in such cases, where the consulship lasted but a year, for the new comer who had done nothing, to bereave the real winner of his honors, if the latter's works were incomplete. Just before Aquilius the new consul appeared on the stage, Paperna was taken sick at Pergamus, and died.²¹

A word remains to be said as to the probable fate of the poor slaves and freedmen who formed the principle part of the army of revolution. Almost nothing is left us on this point. Aristonicus it is known, was taken by sea to Rome in chains and strangled in the cell of his prison, B. C. 129. His ardent and faithful friend Blossius of Cuinæ, seeing his cause, and lifework, thus ground to powder between the millstones of Roman power, desired no longer to live. In his philosophy of human equality which this defeat had practically extinguished, death seemed preferable to a lonely existence and he put an end to himself.

But what of the rank and file? It would seem by the silence itself of historians and the otherwise unaccountable delay of Paperna at the scene of his victory—delay which brought his departure for Pergamus late into the following fall although the battle was fought in the early spring—nearly the entire summer had been consumed in the horrible work of crucifying the unfortunate working-people who, through that battle, had lost their cause.²² Could there have remained to us one faithful copy describing the scenes of vengeance²³ and the dangling corpses left rotting on the gibbets of Stratoniceæ in Careia, we should then have a chronicle of things perfectly harmonious with the brutal nature

²¹ Valerius Maximus, III. iv, 5: De Humili Loco Natis. "Non parvus consulatus rabor M. Perperna, utpote qui consul ante quam civis; sed in bello gerendo utilior aliquanto reipub. Varrone imperatore. Regem enim Aristonicum cepit, Orontianæque stragis punitor extitit. Cum interim ejus vita triumphavit, mors Papia lege damnata est. Namque patrem illius, nihil ad se pertinentia civis Romani jura complexum Sabelli judicio petiit, redire in pristinas sedes coegerunt. Ita M. Perpernae nomen adumbratum, falsus consulatus, caliginis simile imperium, caducus triumphus, aliena in urbe improbe peregrinatus est."

²² Plato, Laws, book IX. chap. 9, in giving his directions regarding the treatment of a slave who is a murderer or accessory to the crime, lays down the rule that if a freeman or citizen commit homicide he shall be turned over to the murdered man's relatives, who have the power to redeem him for money, for good previous conduct, or through the intercession of his friends. If however, the crime be committed upon a citizen by a slave, such offender is to be handed over to the relatives who are to torture or otherwise punish him without limit, as they please: the only proviso being that the torture or punishment shall not stop short of death. This is Plato's state of the "Blessed"—lenient in comparison with the existing laws—and as the customs of the Greek-speaking Asians and islanders were fully as severe as those of the Athenians and fellow countrymen of Plato, it cannot be supposed that anything less than death could have befallen the victims of Paperna. The following is Plato's law; which we give in English: "If a slave kills his master in a passion, let the kindred of the deceased use the murderer in whatever manner they please, and be clean of the acts, so long as they do not by any means preserve the life of the slave." But in the same law Plato rules that this happy republic shall "let him who kills his own slave, undergo a purification." (Translation of Burges). Surely a human low-born was considered inferior to a dog, for that animal was often exempt by reason of his irresponsibility!

²³ That this was a genuine labor rebellion there seem to be no grounds for doubt. Dr. Bücher, Anstände der Unfreien Arbeiter, S. 107-8, in the following significant language brings forward the question of the prevailing ideas of those people, especially the laboring class, whose organizations were being seriously threatened by these events: These Attalic societies had always hitherto been not only befriended but protected by the Pergamenian kings. We quote the words of Dr. Bücher on the Dionysian Communists: "Die letztere bestand darin, das sich die Feiernden durch Weihen und Stühnungen, durch tüpige Tänze unter dem Klang der Flöte und der Handpauke in sinnbertückenden Tummel und wilde Begeisterung versetzten, in der sie sich zur Gottheit emporzuschwingen, Wunder sehen und verrichten zu können meinten. Wenn gerade damals diese Kulte auch im eigentlichen Griechenland in einer grossen Zahl von geschlossenen Vereinen und frommen Bruderschaften gepflegt wurden (S. 84. 92), so ist das, was ihnen Verbreitung verschaffte, nicht sowohl das Zaubermeer eines schrankenlosen Sinnenrausches, in das sich ein unbefriedigtes, überreiztes Geschlecht so gern versenkt, als vielmehr die diesen Genossenschaften eigenthümliche, der socialen Anschauungsweise der Hellenen fremde Gleichstellung aller Mitglieder, mochten sie Griechen oder Barbaren, Männer oder Frauen, Freie oder Sklaven sein. Darnach ist die Bezeichnung, Bürger der Sonnenstadt, zu beurtheilen; sie schied die Anhänger des Aristonikos als die gläubige Gemeinde des Adad von den Ungläubigen, die verbrüdeten Armen und Elenden von ihren feindlichen Bedrängern, wie wir den von Eunus auf den Schild gehobenen Namen der 'Syrer' demzufolge auch nach der religiösen Seite werden zu nehmen haben, als das Kennzeichen der Anhänger der Atargatis." This Atargatis was the veritable goddess Ceres, protectress of labor, of whom we have already spoken so much in our chapters on the Eleusinian Mysteries, and on Eunus and Athenion of Sicily. Several coincident circumstances crowd themselves into this connection, to-wit: This is the prolific, original soil of the early Christian church. The apostles must have used these half-smothered communes, ready in advance, perforce their own previous cult, to embrace any new idea that promised relief; for the rebellion having failed, all the free farmers, mechanics and laborers were dragged down to slavery; and their condition was, at the beginning of our era infinitely worse than it had ever been before. Again, this very spot together with the adjacent islands, is to this day the repository of innumerable inscriptions—the marvel of Archæologists—which begin to be the subject of contention among scholars who are averse to recognizing such a thing as a labor movement, and who are consequently nonplussed regarding anything other than their own debatable grounds regarding their origin as well as their immense numbers. What were they; who were they; whence are they? Our answer is that they were nothing other than labor societies, which for hundreds of years had been legalized at Rome, in Greece, in Egypt. (See Herodotus, II. 164-8 and 177, which makes it almost certain that Solon carried his law from Egypt), everywhere; but which the then existing anti-labor hostility at Rome, caused by the greed of Roman land and slave speculators and their politicians, was in a desperate struggle to subdue, by a measure (which they finally passed), known in modern times as conspiracy laws. After this hostility set in, the poor creatures were obliged in conformity to some law, to shield themselves by the cloak of ostentatious religious rites, graven into their inscriptions; and it is here that the archaeologists are misled.

of the Romans and bearing the reflex of probability, in the similar pictures of horrors which, in every other case we have described, were painted by the historians' pen, as in letters of blood, warning all workingmen of the ghastly wages of rebellion. We are left no personal description even of the hero of this great uprising which involved 3 years of savage fighting, many drawn battles with the Asians, the siege and taking of several fortified cities, and the defeat and disastrous overthrow of one large, well-generated and thoroughly equipped consular army of Rome. All we know is the short but numerous and fully corroborated statements given as cold and feelingless facts, by chroniclers of different periods, different nationality, sentiment and language. To suppose this to have been an exception to the deeply fixed habit of intimidation and condign vengeance of the Romans, or that these rebel workmen were treated with more lenity than those who had espoused the cause of Eunus and Cleon, or were to espouse in the coming struggles of Tryphon and Athenion or of Spartacus and Crixus, would be to admit that unheard of departure of the Romans from a fixed principle. No; the scenes of blood-spilling which followed the downfall of Aristonicus were appalling. But that very blood was the seed of a sect which soon afterwards, near that very region, bore fruits destined to destroy the Pagan system of slavery and to rear a new one based upon kindness, forbearance, mutual love, brotherhood and recognized equality of the human race.

CHAPTER XI.

ATHENION.

ENORMOUS STRIKE AND UPRISING IN SICILY.

SECOND SICILIAN LABOR-WAR—Tryphon and Athenion—Greed and Irascibility Again Grapple—The War Plan of Salvation Repeated by Slaves and Tramps—Athenion, another remarkable General Steps Forth—Castle of the Twins in a Hideous Forest—Slaves goaded to Revolt by Treachery and Intrigue of a Politician—Rebellion and the Clangor of War—Battle in the Mountains—A Victory for the Slaves at the Heights of Engyon—Treachery of Gaddæus the Freebooter—Decoy and Crucifixions—Others cast Headlong over a Precipice—The Strike starts up Afresh at Heraclea Minoa—Murder of Clonius a rich Roman Knight—Escape of Slaves from his Ergastulum—Sharp Battles under the Generalship of Salvius—Strife rekindles in the West—Battle of Alaba—The Proprætor punished for his bad Administration—Victory Again Wreathes a Laurel for the Lowly—A vast Uprising in Western Sicily—Athenion the Slave Shepherd—Another Fanatical Crank of Deeds—Rushing the Struggle for Existence—Fierce Battles and Blood-spilling—What Ordinary Readers of History have not heard of—Fourth Battle; Triokala—Meek Sacrifices by the Slaves, to the Twins of Jupiter and Thalia—March to Triokala—Jealousy—Great Battle and Carnage—Athenion Wounded—He escapes to Triokala and recovers—Fifth Battle—Lucullus marches to the Workingmen's Fortifications—Battle of Triokala—The Outcasts Victorious—Lucullus is lost from View—Sixth Battle—Servilius, another Roman General Overthrown—The Terrible Athenion Master of Sicily and King over all the Working-People—Seventh and Final Field Conflict—Battle of Macella—Death of Athenion—Victory this Time for the Romans—End of the Rebellion—Satyros, a powerful Greek Slave escapes to the Mountains with a Force of Insurgents—They are finally lured to a Capitulation by Aquillius who treacherously breaks Faith and consigns them as Gladiators to Rome—They fight the Eighth and last Battle in the Roman Amphitheatre among wild Beasts—A ghastly mutual Suicide—The Reaction—Treachery of Aquillius Punished—The Gold-Workers pour melted Gold down his Throat.

An enormous and memorable uprising or strike, both of slaves and wage workers of antiquity, occurred in Sicily, beginning 29 years after the close of the war of Eunus, which ended B. C. 133, bringing the date at B. C. 104.

As in the account we have given of the first servile war of Eunus, Achæus and Cleon we have followed the admirable chronology and other points of Dr. Karl Bücher, so in this second war, we follow the splendid elaboration of Prof. Otto Siefert, the learned doctor-professor at the college-gymnasium of Altona.¹

It has already been observed that there existed among the ancients, an occasional asylum where slaves and freedmen driven to straits by the cruelty of others, could in emergencies, flee and hide in security, under the protecting ægis of a certain divinity. There existed such an asylum in Sicily. It was located on the sombre shores of two small lakes eastward from Syracuse in the interior. The asylum was built in honor of the Palikoi, twin children of Jupiter and the nymph Thalia. The legend is, that out from the surface of one of the lakes a hideous column of sulphurous waters sprang high into the air like a fountain, causing an unendurable smell and a deafening roar.² Here stood a temple or Pagan convent and asylum. All around was the hideous forest. In view near by was a craggy mountain-steep where dwelt elves and urchins, ¹ Siefert, Sklavenkriege auf Sicilien, Altona, 1860, S. 24-40, Brochure. We quote his note 69, S. 36, on the sources of information whence we derive our knowledge of this uprising, and the duration of time it occupied, as follows: "Quellen dieses zweiten Sklavenkrieges sind: Florus, Epitom. Historiarum Romanarum, Bb. III. cap. 19; Dion. Cass. Exc. Peiresc. 101, 104; Diodor XXXVI. Liv. LXIX. Die Dauer: ὁ μὲν οὖν κατὰ Σικελίαν τῶν οἰκετῶν πόλεμος διαμείνας ἔτη σχεδόν πρὸς τέτταρα τραγικὴν ἔσχε τὴν καταστροφὴν. M. Aquillius beendigte ihn im J. 99, nachdem er 101 als Consul den Oberbefehl übernommen hatte; als der Krieg ausbrach, war Licinius Nerva Proprætor, nach ihm kommandierten L. Lucullus und C. Servilius; also begann die Empörung im Laufe des Jahres 104. Euseb. Arm. setzt irrthümlich das Ende um 4 Jahre später an auf Olympiad, 171, 2, (95)." The events being obscure though thrilling and often highly romantic, we shall reproduce verbatim many of the paragraphs of these and several other highly respectable contributors to the history.

² Aristotle on Wonders, 57. Diod. Sic. XI. 88-90. Παλικὸν λιμὴν. It seems to have been a forest marsh or swamp.

demons of the mountain and of the wailing woods. Satyrs and wizzards danced the mad antics of fury to the æolian strain of their harps; while Thalia, mother-goddess of the twins, smiled on them as their idyllic muse; and her guardian command hushed the frenzied winds and waters, and balmed their sulphurous odors with the breath of encouragement.³

This was the spook and goblin-haunted asylum where, in the summer of B. C. 104, a large number of naked, hard-worked and sweat-begrimed slaves gathered together for the protection of the institution. They were stragglers from Syracuse who had undergone an examination of their eligibility to life and liberty.

What was the deep motive which inspired so strange a visitation as this, coming unheralded to the old castle at the swamps of the twins?⁴ The workingmen had, as it were, of their own spontaneous instincts, centered there for safety! A full explanation of this is a history of one of the most desperate and sanguinary rebellions recorded in history.

Marius was one of the two consuls of Rome in B. C. 104. In order to help him carry out the war measures which had been determined upon, the Roman Senate had authorized him to secure troops by conscription from the conquered provinces. Sicily, ever since the Punic wars had been one of these provinces. Almost every human creature not possessing the blood of a gens family in this palaestra of suffering was now a slave.⁵ The condition, bad enough before, was rendered worse if possible, by the ghastly defeat of the 200,000 slaves, in their uprising and war of rebellion under Eunus a generation before.⁶ But it was for Nicomides, king of Bithynia, in far off Asia Minor, to kindle the war-fagots. Bithynia though a kingdom of some independence was nevertheless a satrapy of Rome; and the order of Marius the consul, that Nicomides should levy troops out of his dependency, for the Roman army, could not be carried out for the reason that the rapacious Roman tax-gatherers known as publicans⁷ had sold almost everybody into slavery and it was degrading, and contrary to all law and rule of antiquity except in the severest emergencies, to make soldiers of slaves. This made the senatus consulti a dead letter. Rome was vast in actual dominion at this time and any law touching one part, generally held good also for any other. It was found on test that also in Sicily, the majorities were slaves and that, like Nicomides, so also Nerva, proprætor over Sicily under Marius, was cut off from the hope of supplying his quota of troops for the Roman army.

³ Diod. XI. 89 Ἐπεὶ δὲ περὶ τῶν θεῶν τούτων ἐμνήσθημεν, οὐκ ἄξιόν ἐστι παραλιπεῖν τὴν περὶ τὸ ἱερὸν ἀρχαιότητά τε καὶ τὴν ἀπιστίαν καὶ τὸ σύνολον τὸ περὶ τοὺς ὀνομαζομένους κρατήρας ἰδίωμα. Μυθολογοῦσι γὰρ τὸ τέμενος τοῦτο διαφέρειν τῶν ἄλλων ἀρχαιότητι καὶ σεβασμῷ, πολλῶν ἐν αὐτῷ παραδόξων γεγενημένων. Πρῶτον μὲν γὰρ κρατήρες εἰσι τῷ μεγέθει μὲν οὐ κατὰ πᾶν μεγάλοι, σπινθήρας δ' ἐξαισίους ἀναβάλλοντες ἐξ ἁμυνήτου βυθοῦ καὶ παραπλήσιον ἔχοντες τὴν φύσιν τοῖς λέβησι τοῖς ὑπὸ πυρὸς πολλοῦ καιομένοις καὶ τὸ ὕδωρ διάπυρον ἀναβάλλουσιν. Ἐμφασιν μὲν οὖν ἔχει τὸ ἀναβαλλόμενον ὕδωρ ὡς ὑπάργει διάπυρον, οὐ μὴν ἀκριβῆ τὴν ἐπίγνωσιν ἔχει διὰ τὸ μηδένα τολμᾶν ἄψασθαι τούτου· τηλικαύτην γὰρ ἔχει κατάπληξιν ἢ τῶν ὑγρῶν ἀναβολή, ὥστε δοκεῖν ὑπὸ θείας τινὸς ἀνάγκης γίνεσθαι τὸ συμβαῖνον. Τὸ μὲν γὰρ ὕδωρ θείου κατάκορον τὴν ὀσφρησιν ἔχει, τὸ δὲ χάσμα βρόμον πολὺν καὶ φοβερὸν ἐξίησι, τὸ δὲ δὴ τούτων παραδοξότερον, οὔτε ὑπερεκχεῖται τὸ ὑγρὸν οὔτε ἀπολείπει, κίνησιν δὲ καὶ βίαν ρεύματος εἰς ὕψος ἐξαιρομένην ἔχει θαυμάσιον. Τοιαύτης δὲ θεοπρεπείας οὔσης περὶ τὸ τέμενος, οἱ μέγιστοι τῶν ὄρκων ἐνταῦθα συντελοῦνται, καὶ τοῖς ἐπιορκήσασιν σύντομος ἢ τοῦ δαιμονίου κόλασις ἀκολουθεῖ· τινὲς γὰρ τῆς ὁράσεως στερηθέντες τὴν ἐκ τοῦ τεμένους ἄφοδον ποιοῦνται. Μεγάλῃ δ' οὔσης δεισιδαιμονίας, οἱ τὰς ἀμφισβήτησεις ἔχοντες, ὅταν ὑπὸ τινος ὑπεροχῆς κατισχύωνται, τῇ διὰ τῶν ὄρκων τούτων ἀντιρρέσει κρίνονται. Ἔστι δὲ τοῦτο τὸ τέμενος ἐκ τινῶν χρόνων ἄσυλον τετηρημένον, καὶ τοῖς ἀτυχοῦσιν οἰκέταις καὶ κυρίοις ἀγνώμοσι περιπεπτωκόσι πολλὴν παρέχεται βοήθειαν. Τοὺς γὰρ εἰς τοῦτο καταφυγόντας οὐκ ἔχουσιν ἐξουσίαν οἱ δεσπότες βιαίως ἀπάγειν, καὶ μέχρι τούτου διαμένουσιν ἄσιεῖς μέχρι ἂν ἐπὶ διωρισμένοις φιλανθρώποις πείσαντες οἱ κύριοι καὶ δόντες διὰ τῶν ὄρκων τὰς περὶ τῶν ὁμολογιῶν πίστις καταλλαγῶσι. Καὶ οὐδεὶς ἱστορεῖται τῶν δεδωκότων τοῖς οἰκέταις πίστιν πάντῃ παραβάς· οὕτω γὰρ ἢ τῶν θεῶν δεσιδαιμονία τοὺς ὁμόσαντας πρὸς τοὺς δούλους πιστοὺς ποιεῖ. Ἔστι δὲ καὶ τὸ τέμενος ἐν πεδίῳ θεοπρεπεῖ κείμενον καὶ στοαῖς καὶ ταῖς ἄλλαις καταλύσεσιν ἱκανῶς κεκοσμημένον.

⁴ Id. See note above. "Μυθολογοῦσι γὰρ τὸ τέμενος τοῦτο διαφέρειν τῶν ἄλλων ἀρχαιότητι καὶ σεβασμῷ, πολλῶν ἐν αὐτῷ, παραδόξων γεγενημένων."

What was to be done? On an investigation it was found that most of the workingmen best able to bear arms, were slaves. Again, their owners were unwilling to hear to their being set free. It would be a loss of property. These clubbed together and pooled their money, being politicians enough to know that an offer of a bribe would have the desired effect upon the proprætor Nerva.⁸ Nerva, it appears, took the bribe; but in doing so, performed some queer diplomatical gymnastics in order to glide away from a semblance of blame and thus unintentionally set the whole island into an uproar. He had first published a proclamation requiring all slaves who believed themselves entitled to emancipation, to come and receive their liberty. This was under a new law just enacted by the senate at Rome. The law was suited to the emergency and was indited to read that subjects must no longer be seized by the publicans and sold for taxes; and that those who had been thus sold should be entitled to appear before city officials of their vicinity and receive their liberty.⁹

⁵ Diodorus Siculus, Bibliothecæ Historicæ Reliquæ, XXXVI. lii. 1, 2, 3: "Κατὰ τὴν ἐπὶ τοὺς Κίμβρους τοῦ Μαρίου στρατείαν ἔδωκεν ἡ σύγκλητος ἐξουσίαν τῷ Μάρῳ ἐκ τῶν πέραν θαλάττης ἐθνῶν μεταπέμπεσθαι συμμαχίαν. Ὁ μὲν οὖν Μάριος ἐξέπεμψε πρὸς Νικομήδην τὸν τῆς Βιθυνίας βασιλέα περὶ βοηθείας· ὃ δὲ ἀπόκρισιν ἔδωκε τοὺς πλείους τῶν Βιθυνῶν ὑπὸ τῶν δημοσιωνῶν διαρπαγέντας δουλεύειν ἐν ταῖς ἐπαρχίαις. Τῆς δὲ συγκλήτου ψηφισαμένης ὅπως μηδεὶς σύμμαχος ἐλεύθερος ἐν ἐπαρχίᾳ δουλεύῃ καὶ τῆς τούτων ἐλευθερώσεως οἱ στρατηγοὶ πρόνοιαν ποιῶνται, τότε κατὰ τὴν Σικελίαν ὧν στρατηγὸς Δικίνιος Νεραῖας ἀκολουθῶν τῷ δόγματι συχνοὺς τῶν δούλων ἠλευθέρωσε, κρίσεις πρίρει προθεῖς, ὥς ἐν ὀλίγαις ἡμέραις πλείους τῶν ὀκτακοσίων τυχεῖν τῆς ἐλευθερίας. Καὶ ἦσαν πάντες οἱ κατὰ τὴν νῆσον δουλεύοντες μετέωροι πρὸς τὴν ἐλευθερίαν."

⁶ Diodorus, XXXIV. frag. li. 18.

⁷ The publicani must not be confounded with the vectigalarii as tax collectors. The latter were workingmen with a plebeian society. The publicans were blooded, grasping aristocrats, belonging to the equites and were, according to Cicero, the "flos equitum Romanorum, ornamentum civitatis, firmamentum rei publicæ" (Pro Planc.), words characteristic of this boasting aristocrat. The publicans scattered horror and destruction everywhere. See New Testament, also Smith's Dictionary of the Bible, art. "Publicans."

Now what was the governor to do? The slaves to the number of 800, having become aware of this by the proclamation actually calling them in and eager for liberty, had escaped from their masters, probably by running away and were already thronging around the proprætor in impatient expectancy of the promised papers of emancipation, hoping to join the Roman army and thus become free and honored men. Alas! No such happiness was in reserve for them. The miserable liar, ready to grasp his bribe even at the expense of sullying conscience with malfeasance in office, when the banded slave owners thickened around him pressing on all sides, issued another edict to the slaves advising them to go back to their masters with the treacherously perfidious supplement that he would stand between them and all harm.

Struck down with horror, the poor wretches, feeling that in their surreptitious escape they had partly taken the initiative in procuring their own freedom and knowing the dreadful extent of vengeance which awaited them on their returning to the now exasperated masters, betook themselves as stated, to the citadel of the twins at the lakes of the Puikoi. And well they might; if we may believe the words of Florus who of all other writers had the least sympathy for the slaves in rebellion.¹⁰ Yet Florus describes them as prisoners in chains. All over Sicily there existed prisons called in Latin ergastula, in Greek ergasteria, where slaves were kept in custody over night in irons. Some were forced to work in these dens; but most of them were marched out in the early morning to their grinding labors on the farms.¹¹ During the servile war 20 years before, Eunus attacked these horrid slave-pens and set fully 60,000 of the manacled slaves at liberty.¹² These immediately joined his great army of revolution, swelling it to such an extent that the slaves were victorious in many battles.

⁸ This statement is made on the strength of Dion Cassius (frag. 101), who intimates as much in speaking of the sums pooled by the slave owners.

⁹ Diod. Sic. Bibliotheca XXXVI, frag. iii. 2, as quoted in note 5, q. v.

¹⁰ Florus, Epit. Rerum Romanorum, lib. III. cap. XIX. §. 1, speaking of the first servile war says: Utrumque etsi cum sociis (nefas!) cum liberis tamen et ingenuis dimicatum est. This word nefas characterizes the struggle as a blasphemy.

What took place at the asylum in the forest of Jupiter's twins we are but imperfectly told. They conspired;¹³ though as in the case of every strike of the ancient slaves, so also here, our histories are riddled to fragments. But enough has been preserved from the ruthless vandal's hand to make clear what we shall with confidence relate. A most bloody and devastating war soon burst forth, spreading, in a few days over nearly all of Sicily.

There is a town now called Scillato but in those days the Sicilian Greeks knew the place by the name of Ancyle.¹⁴ Here a massacre announced and kindled the first flames of war. Thirty slaves organized under a leader named Oarius, broke chains in the night, set upon their masters and murdered them in their sleep. Later in the same night, probably through the action of the first thirty, 200 more slaves were delivered from their shackles, or at least from bondage, and the whole neighborhood was made hideous by scenes of terror which they enacted. It was at the slopes of the Nebrode heights not far from the town of Engyion. A fastness crowned the height which, like

¹¹ Flor. 19, "Hic ad cultum agri frequenta ergastula, catenatique cultores."

¹² Idem. c. 6 "Hoc miraculum primum duo millia ex obvili, mox jure belli refractis ergastulis, sexaginta amplius millium fecit exercitum." See war of Eunus chap. IX.

¹³ Diod. XXXVI. frag. III. 3. Dind. says: Οἱ δ' ἐν ἀξιώμασι συνδραμόντες παρεκάλουν τὸν στρατηγὸν ἀποστῆναι πάντας τῆς ἐπιβολῆς. Ὁ δ' εἴτε χρήμασι πεισθεὶς εἴτε χάριτι δουλεύσας, τῆς μὲν τῶν κριτηρίων τούτων σπουδῆς ἀπέστη, καὶ τοὺς προσιόντας ἐπὶ τῷ τυχεῖν τῆς ἐλευθερίας ἐπιπλήττων εἰς τοὺς ἰδίους κυρίους προσέταττεν ἐπαναστρέφειν. Οἱ δὲ δοῦλοι συνατράφοντες, καὶ τῶν Ξυρακουσῶν ἀπαλαγέντες, καὶ καταφυγόντες εἰς τὸ τῶν Παλικῶν τέμενος, διελάλουν πρὸς ἀλλήλους ὑπὲρ ἀποστάσεως. Nothing however, can be clearer than this fragment of Diodorus. The slaves, screened from harm by the hospitable old temple, had leisure to organize their rebellion on a prodigious scale, which they accomplished with effect.

¹⁴ Siefert, Sicilische Sklavenaufstände, S. 86, note 71, points to Cicero, Verrus, III. 45, who writes it "Incilienses," and concludes: "die Stadt ist auf dem Nebrodengebirge in der Nähe von Engyion zu suchen."

the asylum of the Palikoi offered the slaves security. Here they fortified themselves, received allies, sent strong and fearless scouts to cut the bands and set their fellows free and thus in a few days so augmented their force that by the time the Roman prætor made his appearance with an army to put down the emeut, they were strong enough to offer front.

This first organized resistance of the slaves was however, destined to meet with disaster through treachery. A man named C. Titinius Gaddæus probably of Roman and possibly of noble stock, prowled, in those days, about this country, in the capacity of a marauder. He was an escaped convict, having a considerable time before been condemned to death for certain crimes. With a banditti of freebooters of his ilk, he stole about at night, hiding by day in the inaccessible fastnesses of the mountain and thus by robbery and deceit, gained a precarious living, always on the alert for an opportunity and always destitute of conscience. The proprætor, Licinius Nerva who was the cause of the disaffection among the slaves, sought, and probably by promises of exoneration secured, the alliance of this freebooter who subtly set about making the friendship of the slaves then watching an opportunity to destroy the militia which Nerva had levied to put down the trouble. Gaddæus succeeded in decoying the slaves into an ambush and by arrangement turned the poor wretches over to the Roman governor who crucified some of them and others he killed by casting headlong from a high precipice to be dashed to jelly upon the rocks.¹⁵

Nerva now believed the trouble to be over. He was even foolish enough to disband his forces, consisting mostly of militia whom he discharged from further service and sent to their homes. But the slaves seem to have been on the alert; perhaps encouraged by the utter want of generalship shown by Nerva. The question now arises in the mind of the reader how poor, enslaved, ignorant creatures many of whom were in fetters, could have been able to rebel at all; much less keep a correspondence with others sufficiently to know what was going on at different points. The answer must be, that they felt themselves in a desperate condition and combined their entire energy and intelligence to greater effect than may be naturally imagined. Men engaged in such desperate adventures think nothing of turning night into day; and like the similar case with us in recent days, they may have had secret outposts and means of communication.

¹⁵ Diod XXXVI. lli. 6, fn. Dind. των δ' ἀποστατῶν οἱ μὲν μαχόμενοι κατέκτανον, οἱ δὲ τὴν ἀπὸ τῆς ἀλώσεως δεδιότες τιμωρίαν ἑαυτοὺς κατακρήμνισαν.

At any rate, the Roman general had hardly disbanded his force when the war-cloud gathered in another part of the island. A rich Roman knight named P. Clonius,¹⁶ who possessed estates, such as were celebrated in history as the latifundia, was murdered by his slaves near Heraclea Minoa on the southeastern coast of Sicily. This murder was perpetrated by a band of 80 desperate men who concocted their conspiracy during the lull and broke from the ergastula helping each other by signal, to free themselves. The number in the revolt rapidly increased. The governor, Licinius Nerva, was now in a helpless condition, without an army. The slaves rushed in every direction, freeing each other, and pitched tent on the banks of the river Alaba¹⁷ coursing at the foot of the Mons Caprianus, to the number of over 2,000 men. This, however, occupied some time, during which Nerva succeeded in mustering a considerable force which he marched or transported by water to the scene of war.

The distance from Syracuse to Heraclea Minoa is not far from 95 miles in a straight line westward but following the road or the shortest route by sea around the Portus Odysseæ and past Agrigentum, it could not be less than 130 miles.¹⁸ To convey his army and impedimenta thither and fix his headquarters at Heracleia, occupied so much time that it must have been toward the spring of B. C. 103, before anything serious transpired.

On a favorable position, the two adversaries drew up in line of battle. The name of the Roman commander was M. Titinius,¹⁹ whose forces summed up the largest

¹⁶ Diod. XXXVI. iv. 1, ἐνί: "Τῶν δὲ στρατιωτῶν πρὸς τὰ οἰκεῖα ἤθη ἀπολυθέντων, ἤκόν τινες ἀπαγγέλλοντες ὅτι Πόπλιον Κλόνιον, γενόμενον ἱππέα Ῥωμαίων, ἀναστάντες οἱ δοῦλοι κατέσφαξαν ὀγδοήκοντα ὄντες, καὶ ὅτι πλῆθος ἀγείρουσι."

¹⁷ Diod. XXXVI. 4. "ἐφεξῆς δ' ἐγένοντο τῶν δισχιλίων οὐκ ελαττους." This force of 2,000 men was collected within 7 days.

¹⁸ In relation to Nerva's route Diodorus says nothing.

¹⁹ Diod. XXXVI. 4. 3. Dind. says: Μάρκον Τιτινίον. Nevertheless we are constrained to think Titinius the same person who had betrayed them; i. e. Titinius Gaddæus.

number that the Roman prætor, with the addition of 600 men drawn from the fortress of Enna, was able to muster. On the whole, relying on the superior armor and other equipments of his own men, compared with the destitute condition of the workingmen, who depended upon butcher-knives, sickles, clubs, slings and whatever they could grasp, the Romans seem to have had the advantage. But the rebels besides being full of that courage which desperation inspires and anxious to meet a hated foe, had also the most advantageous position. No details of this battle have come to us further than that it was a fierce and bloody encounter; the slaves fighting desperately following charge with charge, dealing such ponderous blows against their adversary, composed partly of raw militia, that the latter gave way, or were killed on the spot. The rout of the Romans now became general. A panic seized them. They cast away their arms and ran for life. The slaves grasping their weapons, pursued and hacked those whom they could to pieces, scoring a signal victory.

The strike which hitherto had manifested itself in murmuring and an occasional outburst, now assumed warlike proportions. Section after section of the island broke away from their masters and joined the gathering army. The force under drill, soon after the battle at the Alaba river is reported to have been 6,000²⁰ strong; all well equipped with the best of arms which they had taken from the enemy. Greatly encouraged by this first victory, they set about organizing in earnest. More fettered slaves who were working in chains were cut loose from the ergastula or work-prisons. These glad to escape, joined the rank and file, and being the most desperate and brave made reliable soldiers in the insurrection.

A mass meeting was now called for the election of a leader. There was a certain character who had signalized himself as a man of great energy, named Salvius. This man had been the principal in the movement which had consummated the assassination of the Roman knight Clonius, at Heracleia Minoa ending in the defeat of the proprætor

²⁰ Diod. XXXVI. iv. 4: "Καὶ πολλῶν καθ' ἡμέραν ἀφισταμένων, σύντομον καὶ παράδοξον ἐλάμβανον αὐξήσιν, ὥς ἐν ὀλίγαις ἡμέραις πλείους γενέσθαι τῶν ἑξακισχιλίων. Ὅτε δὴ καὶ εἰς ἐκκλησίαν συνελθόντες καὶ βουλῆς προτεθείσης πρῶτον μὲν εἶλαντο βασιλέα τὸν ὀνομαζόμενον Σαλούμιον δοκοῦντα τῆς ἱεροσκοπίας ἔμπειρον εἶναι καὶ ταῖς γυναικείαις θείαις ἀνλομανοῦντα."

Læinius²¹ Nerva at the battle of the Alaba river. Like Eunus, the slave-king of Enna in the war of the strikers, which had ended 29 years before, he was a prophet, a worker of incantations, a flute-player, and dispensed supernatural and wonderful doings among the credulous slaves and freedmen. A slave himself, of superior bearing and gift of command, he was elected by acclamation as king.²² King Salvius immediately on assuming power, turned his attention to organization and order. He taught his wild and often gross-mannered men that success does not come from savagery and rapine nor from destruction of property by laying waste the country and its fruits; and brought them to understand that an unbridled career is dangerous. The army was divided into three divisions, under his three picked warriors as commanders, and marched off at different angles into the country with the order to reunite at a given point, at a given time, bringing with them provisions. The plan succeeded exactly. At the appointed time and place the three divisions again united, having collected from the dairy and stock farms so large a quantity of sheep, cattle, horses, grain and other supplies that the question of want for the army which had also greatly increased, was settled for a long time to come. Great numbers of horses had come into the hands of Salvius. A force of cavalry was organized 2,000 strong, undoubtedly well equipped. The army grew to the majestic proportions of 20,000 foot besides the cavalry—in all 22,000 combatants.²³ With activity this force was drilled to discipline and fitted for receiving the approaching Roman army. King Salvius after completing preparations for a campaign, set off on a march toward Morgantion situated on the coast of Sicily, near the mouth of the river Symethus. Morgantion was a fortified city with a citadel; and had been the seat of a terrible conflict between the slaves and the Romans in the war of Eunus.²⁴ The rebel chieftain hurriedly conveyed his large army

²¹ Diodorus, IV. 4. characterizes Salvius as a Slave who knew the arts of prophecy and could play the flute or horn. He was a favorite with women and possessed the mysterious arts of slight of hand. See note 20, fin.

²² Siefert, Sicilische Sklavenkriege, S. 27. "Indess zeigte Salvius doch eine grössere Befähigung für seine Stellung, als sich nach seinem früheren Leben erwarten liess."

²³ Diod. XXXVI. frag. iv, §§ 7, 7, 8, Dind.

²⁴ See chap. ix., on the Servile war of Eunus.

thither, a distance from Heracleia Minoa of about one hundred miles.

The Roman prætor knowing that greater mischief was meant, had in the meantime collected an army, partly from Italy, partly from Sicily, as well as of stragglers who had survived the last disaster—in all, amounting to 10,000 men. With this force he marched day and night in order to arrive at Morgantion before the rebels could reach the place. This he appears to have succeeded in doing but found nobody but the women and children of the slaves; for the men, aware of the near approach of Salvius and his army had escaped to a hiding haunt which they frequented, by a gate or other means of egress through the walls, during a dark night. Salvius now determined to give his enemy battle. He led his troops in solid phalanx and good order against the prætorian army, making the attack with such a shock as to stagger him by the onset. It appears from a remark made by Diodorus that the prætor must have had slaves as a part of his force; for Salvius, taking advantage of some opportunity, gave the soldiers of the Roman army to understand that they would be freed if they threw down their arms. As a result the Roman troops began to throw away their weapons and save themselves by flight. A panic was thus created and the rout became general. Salvius pursued and succeeded in taking 4,000 Italians and Sicilian Greeks, while 600 were killed on the spot.²⁵ Large quantities of arms fell into the hands of the again victorious rebels, together with all the munitions of war that were stored in the magazines. The victory before Morgantion was complete. Quantities of armor and campaign equipments were taken, together with provisions for maintaining the siege of the city itself. Certain it is, that after the battle, the Roman prætor retired within the fortress of Morgantion with his remaining troops, and by promising the slaves the boon of liberty, which indeed all those poor creatures were fighting for without really knowing how, inspired them to such valiant resistance against their fellow slaves outside, that for a long time no progress was made by Salvius in getting possession of the city and Dr. Siefert is in doubt whether he accomplished it at all.²⁶ But this doubt proceeds from a misunderstanding of the historical fragment of Diodorus, from the point of view of the actual genius of this theme. Diodorus who so long has been misunderstood, knew perfectly well what he was saying when he told us that Salvius when his army had grown to be 30,000 strong sacrificed, after the conquest of Morgantion, to the twin heroes—the very immortals who had protected him a short time before, at a short distance from there, in the Asylum of the poor and unprotected slaves. At their forest asylum, amid the roar of waters and the fumes of sulphur and gloom and loneliness, these twin sons of Jupiter and Thalia had entertained and protected them with the ægis of divinity and it was now in order, at the moment of conquest and victory to sacrifice to them in purple and splendors, in repayment.²⁷

²⁵ Diod. XXXVI. iv. 7. "Οἱ δ' ἀποστάται ἐξαίφνης ἀντεπιθέμενοι, καὶ ὑπερδέξιον τὴν στάσιν ἔχοντες, φηγὲς ἀντεπιθέμενοι, καὶ ὑπερδέξιον τὴν στάσιν ἔχοντες, βιαίως τε ἐπιρράξαντες, εὐθύς ἐπὶ προτερήματος ἦσαν· οἱ δὲ τοῦ στρατηγοῦ ἐτράπησαν πρὸς φυγὴν. Τοῦ δὲ βασιλέως τῶν ἀποστατῶν κήρυγμα ποιησαμένου μηδένα κτείνειν τῶν τὰ ὄπλα ῥιπτούντων, οἱ πλείστοι ῥιπτοῦντες ἔφευγον. Καὶ τούτῳ τῷ τρόπῳ καταστρατηγήσας τοὺς πολεμίους ὁ Σαλούσιος τὴν τε παρεμβολὴν ἀνεκτήσατο καὶ ποριβόητον νίκην ἀπενεγκάμενος, πολλῶν νόπλων ἐκυρίευσεν, Ἀπέθανον δὲ ἐν τῇ μάχῃ τῶν Ἰταλιωτῶν τε καὶ Σικελῶν οὐ πλείους ἑξακοσίων διὰ τὴν τοῦ κηρύγματος φιланθρωπίαν, ἐάλωσαν δὲ περὶ τετρακισχιλίους."

Another reason why the Roman prætor lost Morgantion is that he had been treacherous to the slaves under his command, promising them, as we have stated, that if they fought bravely against their fellows outside, they should have their freedom. This they did valiantly but the perfidious governor again lied them out of this much longed for and expected boon. Whereupon accepting the offer of Salvius to spare all who would throw down their arms, they joined their fellow rebels.²⁸ Thus again the Romans were forced to open their eyes and behold Sicily, their "granary of the world," south and east, in the hands of surging, pitiless slaves in the terrible attitude of rebellion.

²⁶ Siefert, Sicilische Sklavenkriege, S. 27. "Morgantion aber zu nehmen gelang ihm vorerst doch nicht." "Ob in Folge dessen die Stadt fiel, ist aus der erhaltenen Berichten nicht mit Zuverlässigkeit ersichtlich."

²⁷ Diod. XXXVI. vii. 1. Παλικοί." The exact words which seem to have been misunderstood, are: "Ὁ δὲ τὴν Μοργαντίνην πολιορκήσας Σαλούιος, ἐπιδραμὼν τὴν χώραν μέχρι τοῦ Λεοντίνου πεδίου, ἤθροισεν αὐτοῦ τὸ σὺμπαν στρατεύμα, ἐπιλέκτους ἄνδρας οὐκ ἐλάττους τῶν τρισυμρίων, καὶ θύσας τοῖς Παλικοῖς ἥρωσι, τοῦτοις μὲν ἀνέθηκε μίαν τῶν ἀλουργῶν περιπορφύρων στολὴν χαριστήρια τῆς νίκης, αὐτὸς δ' ἀναγορεύσας ἐαυτὸν βασιλέα, Τρύφων μὲν ὑπὸ τῶν ἀποστατῶν προσηγούμετο." The language is unmistakable. Still Dr. Siefert thus muses: "Doch können sich diese Worte auch auf den Sieg über Licinius Nerva beziehen, und so ist es wohl, da πολιορκήσας nicht füglich für ἐκπολιορκήσας genommen werden kann." But the whole phrase reads plainly that Salvius was master of the situation.

²⁸ Siefert, Sicilische Sklavenkriege, S. 27. "Unbegreiflicher Weise versagte der Prætor diesen Versprechen die Bestätigung und trieb dadurch den größten Theil dieser Tapferen in das Lager der Auführer."

Lilybæum and Segesta or the old Ægesta stood on the Mediterranean sea; the former at the western extremity, the latter northward in the sinus Segestanus, 25 miles apart. This new scene of the slave rebellion opens 150 miles or more from that of the battle grounds of Morgantion. No newspapers, no railroads, no telegraphs to convey news particulars or rumors of events. How then, in a reign of suppression and terror among maddened masters with their whips, chains, ergastula and crucifixion-gibbets and their optional use, could all the slaves of Sicily, even those of the farthest extreme, have known, understood, reciprocated with each other, midst these awful tumults of self-enfranchisement?

On one of those western farms of Sicily there writhed in the fetters of compulsory labor, a man named Athenion—a slave, yet born with all the proud and lofty impulses of manhood. Florus who, unlike Diodorus, spoils his histories with unkind allusions,²⁹ unmindful of the desperate acts he himself might have resorted to under similar treatment, speaks bitterly of him but in his words of vituperation gives us valuable facts. This man's name was Athenion. He was a Cilician by birth;³⁰ but having a superior bearing and faculty of command, had charge of 200 herdsmen on one of the great stock farms of that productive region of Sicily. His family and those of his men and fellow slaves were kept at work in the slave pens or ergastula, as distinctly stated by Florus. Athenion and his men over whom he officiated as boss or overseer, feeling that a time had come to strike the blow for liberty and, as we are obliged to surmise, posted regarding the doings of King Salvius, far to the other extremity of Sicily, determined to make a desperate trial to obtain freedom from servility and degradation.³¹ He imparted his plan to a few of his men. The result was that at an appointed time the 200 slaves attacked their owners—two millionaire brothers—killed them, ran and cut the fetters from their families in the slave-prison, set them free, everywhere sounding the bugles of rebellion, and set about arming and drilling the men who came running into the quarters from all directions, begging for enrollment. In five days there were more than a thousand slaves under arms, with Athenion as leader.

²⁹ Epitom. III. 19. "Athenio pastor, interfecto domino, familiam ergastulo liberatam sub signis ordinat. Ipse veste purpurea, argenteoque baculo et regium in morem fronte redimita, non minorem, quam ille fanaticus prior, conflatur exercitum; acriusque multo, quasi et illum vindicaret, vicos, castella, oppida diripiens, in dominos in servos infestius, quasi in transfugas sæviebat."

³⁰ "Athenio Cillex." See Dind. paraphrase of Diod. XXXVI. v. 1. Cilicia was on the borders of Syria in Asia Minor but a few miles from Palestine. He hailed from near the stage of the greater movement 100 years later.

³¹ Diod. XXXVI. v. 1-4.

Athenion was another man of wonders, and he now began to assume the unnatural powers of Messiah, king, fortuneteller, star-gazer and prophet. The result of such manoeuvres of course, was to confirm the ignorant slaves at his command, in the belief that he was initiated into the favors of the gods. They elected him king of the rebel government. Apparently aware of the methods of Eunus and of Salvius; and judging in his own way the errors of their plans, Athenion blocked out a plan of his own, unique and farsighted. He refused to except all the slaves who came flocking into his army, mad with the delirium of revenge, desperate in risks, and eager for war to the knife. He examined them and accepted only those whom he judged most powerful, obedient and fearless. All the rest he sent back to their old employment with orders to cultivate the land and multiply the stock and other land products,²³ lest there come a famine which would be more destructive to the army than an enemy from Rome. He set himself up as a star-gazer and proclaimed to his men that he read in the stars how he was to be the king over all the Sicilians. Under these auspices the army had swollen to 10,000 men. We are distinctly informed that he was vain enough to strut about considerably, with fine purple and sporting a silver cane;²⁴ but the kind-hearted reader, in view of the shrewd policy of this conduct, may see fit to forgive a poor branded slave, whose only clothes probably had hitherto been his naked skin.²⁴

The first campaign of Athenion was against the fortified city of Lilybæum which he attacked with his 10,000 men. The siege continued for some time without success; and he concluded, with much wisdom, Dr. Siefert says,³⁵ to raise the siege, saying that the gods were so unfavorable to the taking of Lilybæum that a disaster was about as certain as a victory. The wisdom of thus desisting from this attempt to carry the city by siege, Dr. Siefert does not state. Still it is self-evident, resting upon Athenion's probable information of the arrival from Mauritania of a large detachment of men which king Bocchus, a dependent of Rome, had dispatched to the rescue of Lilybæum. Even as it was, the shrewd slave-king with all his efforts to vacate did not succeed without his being attacked on the night of their landing, by the Moors and suffering considerably. Athenion who seems to have depended upon his gifts of imbibing counsel from supernatural sources,³⁶ did not expect so much from the fortified cities as did Eunus and Cleon, whose terrible starvation when hemmed in and besieged by the Romans at Morgantion and Enna, was still fresh in the memory of many. Here he seems to have been wise. He afterwards found that those fortresses if left to themselves, conquered themselves, as it were, by strifes and turmoils of the citizens with their slaves who were plotting to get away and join the insurgents under arms. In consequence, the rebels had no fear of the cities joining the Roman forces; since they had all they could attend to, keeping mischief in quell at home. The whole country, however, was soon in possession of the strikers.

²³ Many of these farms however were now entirely in their own hands, the owners having been killed.

²⁴ Flor., Epitom. III. 19. "Ipse vesta pupurea, argenteoque baculo"

²⁴ Diod. XXXIV. frag. ii. 38, tells the story of the slaves of Sicily branded to the bone, whipped because they dared ask for a few rags to protect them from winter.

A new source of the insurgents, strength now devel-

³⁵ Siefert, Stilische Sklavenkriege, S. 27-28: "Der Sterndeuterel kundig, hatte er in den Sternen gelesen, dass er König über ganz Sicilien sein werde: deshalb suchte er den geordneten Zustand auf der Insel, die er schon als sein Eigenthum ansah, aufrecht zu erhalten. Ein Angriff auf das feste Lilybaeum, den er mit zehntausend Mann unternahm gelang zwar nicht, diente aber doch dazu, den Glauben an seine Sehergabe zu bestärken. Als er nämlich mit grosser Klugheit die Belagerung aufzuheben beschloss, unter dem Vorgeben, den Göttern gefalle diese Unternehmung nicht und man könnte eine Niederlage nur durch raschen Abzug vermeiden, trat schon das Verkündete ein. Ein Korps maurischer Hülfsstruppen, welches der neue Bundesgenosse der Römer, König Bocchus von Mauretanien, unter Anführung des Gomon den bedrängten Lilybetanern zugesendet hatte, machte sofort nach seiner Landung einen nächtlichen Angriff und fügte den schon im Abmarsch begriffenen Truppen des Athenion nicht unbedeutenden Schaden zu."

³⁶ Cf. Bücher, Aufstände der Unfreien Arbeiter, S. 78. "Man darf sich die Schwierigkeiten, welche den Führer einer Sklavenbewegung erwarteten, ja nicht als gering vorstellen."

oped itself. The poor free people, whose condition was oftentimes worse than that of the slaves themselves, came in great numbers and joined the phalanx of the slaves.³⁷ They were ground to powder between the masters and the slaves. Not unfrequently their miserable condition was such that they resorted to violence of themselves; and many being organized in unions as we have shown, they were a source of turmoil.³⁸ Thus these combined sources of power made up a large army which Dr. Siefert, shrewdly catching a most important statement of Florus and carefully paraphrasing the torn fragments of Diodorus and Dion Cassius, sets aside the contradictory statement of Cicero, thus resuscitating and making tangible what must clearly have been two terrible battles involving the acknowledged overthrow of two Roman prætors, one after the other.³⁹

³⁷ Diod. XXXVI. frag. vi. Dind. There is material extant sufficient for an interesting and instructive essay on the ancient tramps of Sicily and other countries. So interesting is this account of the ancient tramps that we present Dindorf's paraphrase of Diodorus in full on the tramp question: "Ingens vero turbarum confusio, et malorum, quod dicitur. Illas Siciliam universam occuparat. Non enim servi tantum, sed etiam ex liberis egestate afflicti omne rapinarum et flagitiorum genus committebant, et quicumque offerrentur, servi aut ingenui, ne quis perditam illorum malitiam enuntiaret, omnes impudenter trucidabant. Ideo quotquot in urbibus se continebant, vix illa quæ intra pomeria essent, pro suis habebant: quæ vero extra, aliena ex legique violentiæ mancipata judicabant. Multa insuper alia a multis contra normam æquitatis et humanitatis per Siciliam audacter peragebantur." But this historian does not stop here. The tramps who were freedmen who, on account of the newly imported cheap labor of the slaves, were suffering from want of means, unable longer to find employment, had grown desperate to the last degree, and fearfully dangerous. Fragment xi. continues the description of those terrible days and desperate men as follows: "Non enim servi dumtaxat rebelles Siciliam vastabant, sed etiam ingenui, quotquot nec prædialia nec agros possidebant, ad latrocinia et rapinas conversi, catervatim per regionem discursabant, et, paupertate simul et mala mente impulsæ, armenta et pecora abigebant, fruges in villis conditas diripiebant, et obvium quemque nullo discrimine, servum an ingenuum, obtruncabant, ne quis esset qui eorum furorē ac facinora indicaret. Quumque in Sicilia justitum esset, eo quod nullus prætor populi Romani jus dicebat, cuncti liberrime licentiam nacti impune debacchabantur: proinde nullus non locus infamis erat rapinis ac latrocinis ac vi perditorum hominum in ditissimi cujusque fortunas secure invadentium. At illi, qui paullo ante fama atque opibus clarissimi inter cives suos fuerant, tunc fortuna subito commutata non modo a fugitivis per summam contumeliam compliabantur, sed præterea injurias et insolentiam hominum ingenuorum perferre cogebantur. Quocirca universi vix illa, quæ intra pomerium erant, pro suis habebant: quæcunque vero extra urbium muros erant posita, ea aliena et prædonum violentiæ obnoxia existimabant. Denique per singulas urbes atque oppida ingens confusio ac perturbatio juris judiciorumque erat. Nam perduelles, quum agrum omnem agminibus suis occuparent infensi dominis suis atque inexplebili cupiditate flagrantes, itinera omnia intercludebant. Qui vero in urbibus supererant adhuc servi, ægri ac defectionem animis spirantes, terrori dominis erant."

³⁸ Siefert, idem, S. 28: "Diese besitzlosen Freien übten oft nach Ärgere Gewaltthaten aus als die Sklaven. Es herrschte eine masslose Verwirrung und Gesetzlosigkeit, eine Kακὸν Ἰδέας, wie Diodor sagt." See Diod. XXXVI. frag. vi. int.; also our note 37 above.

³⁹ Cicero, Verr., II. 54, gives it as follows: "Athenionem qui nullum oppidum cepit." Of course; for he had determined wisely from the start, not to molest the towns. Siefert however, idem, S. 36 remarks in note 76: "Bei

The truth as to the lost histories of this bloody war is made up by a short but clear statement in Florus' Epitome of Roman history, and for perfect fairness we propose to use the old recensio and notes of Fischer and Duker. Florus, being an aristocrat of an exalted gens family, either of the proud Julian or of the Annæan stock, enjoying the family prestige of the Cæsars, whose instincts, true to the genius of the Pagan world could muster no sympathy and hardly a contemptuous pity for so mean and degraded a creature as a slave, would surely not have confessed, in writing his epigrammatical story of Athenion, to more than the truth. His sense of humiliation as he confesses the terrible flagellations which his country received during the servile wars, comes repeatedly to the surface in his pages, betraying the feelings of moral nausea; and he confesses no more humiliations of his family and race than truth compels. Yet Florus distinctly tells us that Athenion utterly destroyed two Roman prætors, or at least their armies and camps.⁴⁰ This is perfectly consistent with the general contour of the story. A Roman leader possibly Lucullus, who afterwards fought Salvius, with a probable force of Moors under some commander sent out by King Bocchus, had arrived in time to save Lilybæum from the assault of Athenion. When their fleet unexpectedly appeared, Athenion retired at night but was attacked and somewhat damaged before making good his escape. The rebel commander now prepared himself for a general engagement with the allied armies of Lucullus and Bocchus.

It is, therefore, not until after the battle of Triocala that we can apply the statement of Florus regarding Athenion:

Cicero ist der Zweck der Erwähnung wohl ins Auge zu fassen." See Supra.

⁴⁰ Florus, Epit. Rerum Romanarum, lib. III. cap. 19, §. 11. "Athenio pastor sæviebat. Ab hoc, quoque Prætorii exercitus cæsi, capta Servilii castra, capta Luculli" (castra). In note h. Fischer explains as follows: "Servilii Castra, Capta Luculli. Alios Annales habuit Florus; nam ex nostris, C. Servilii et C. Licinii Luculli castra non modo non capta fuisse, contra vero, et a Lucullo victore semel, et a Servilio tantum non repressos fuisse servos manifestum est." This is as we surmised. Florus had at his command at the time he wrote, works of history which at present do not exist at all as here suggested by Fischer. By the defeats of Athenion are only meant those occurring at Triocala and the previous repulse though not a defeat which he had suffered on his withdrawal from Lilybæum. We now turn to the Duker comments §. 11, p. 919 Delphine classics, and this: "Ab hoc quoque Diodorus, lib. XXXVI, tribuit hæc Salvio cuiusdam, cui Athenio, velut imperator rigi, audiens fuerit." True, Diodorus says Salvius was victorious over a prætor but it was on the extreme east coast and the prætor was neither Servilius nor Lucullus but the proprætor, P. Licinius Nerva. Nothing is safer than to follow Siefert, q. v. Seite 30.

"This man putting on raiment of purple, sporting a silver cane, his forehead coronated in the manner of kings, not less fanatical than the fellow Eunus before him, inflamed his army and melted together their sympathies so that they were even far more bitter; and then, as if to vindicate this predecessor's actions, raved over towns, castles, villages, tearing them to pieces, inciting the slaves against their masters and causing them to turn traitors and join his hordes. Thus he met and captured the camps of Servilius and likewise those of Lucullus." These are the plain words of Florus, who though whimsically proud, was honest. Accepting them we proceed; for he framed this statement from historical sources now not extant.

We now return to the movements of Salvius, the slave-king of Sicily, whom we left after the battle before Morgantion, in possession of the whole country, having beaten the proprætor, Licinius Nerva, and consummated a great sacrificial solemnity to the honor of the twins of Jupiter in whose asylum they had from the first been protected. This worthy flute-player, Messiah and prophet, had in the meantime not been idle. The army of picked men was now augmented to a force of 30,000, and by direction of Salvius, concentrated into one solid army-corps. The union of these men was effected at or in the vicinity of Leontini, in the fruitful valley of one of the many beautiful rivers which fall into the Mediterranean from the mountains. Here on the occasion of another ovation in thanks and honor to the Palikoi or twins, for propitiating the victories, the slave-king assumed the robes of royalty and the more resounding name of Tryphon;⁴¹ ordering that henceforth he should be known by that name. The next thing was to select a situation whereat to establish himself. With this intention he now resumed his march back to the spot where the first decisive battle had been won.

Salvius, alias Triphon, appeared at the stronghold of Triocala on the upper waters of the Alaba river where were combined sweet waters, fruit, wine, oil and all the profusion of vegetable and animal plentitude. Here was improvised for him a palace. Athenion, the rival slave-king was summoned to appear, and brought with him 3,000 men, leaving 7,000 or more in the field, under proper leaders. Siefert thinks the object of Tryphon in sending for Athenion was to put him in chains through impulses of jealousy.⁴⁵ At any rate, Athenion was arrested and for this treachery Tryphon afterwards paid with bitterness; for retribution was at hand. Nevertheless, the fortifications which had been designed went on to completion. The place was surrounded by a wall and dykes 5,000 feet in length and became a large market place. Triphon chose for himself a council and lictors in the manner of the Romans. These strode about on guard with their bundles of whips and their hatchets in hand, attired in jewels and purple.⁴⁶ While this was going on Athenion, the bravest and wisest of the two slave-kings, lay in chains, waiting for his opportunity. It came.

⁴¹ Büch. Aufst S. 78, says his real name was Diodotus Tryphon and eltes Weeseling.

The year B. C. 103 witnessed in Rome the fitting out of the proprætor L. Licinius Lucullus who with an army of Romans and Italians 14,000 strong arrived in Sicily. On landing the force was augmented by 800 Bithynians, Thessalians and Acarnanians, 600 Lucanians led by the bold Cleptius and 600 others of different extraction. This formed a total of 16,000 men. But it must by no means be reasoned from this statement that there was no considerable army of the defeated and scattered ranks of Nerva and the Moors, to be collected by Lucullus wherewith largely to augment his army in Sicily itself. Undoubtedly the combined army of Lucullus when in readiness for the great battle which we are going to recount, numbered 25,000, many of whom were experienced veterans. With this large army, many of whom were Romans, the governor boldly marched across to within a mile and a half from Triocala which he intended to besiege and take by storm. Like Rupillius before, he was provided with thongs and gibbet-makers, to crucify the slaves who should fall into his hands.

⁴⁵ Siefert, Sicilische Sklavenkriege, S. 29. "Welche Gründe ihn hierzu bewogen hatten, ist nicht klar: sicher jedoch, dass Triphon in ihm einen heimlichen Nebenbuhler sah den er sobald sich eine günstige Gelegenheit bot, verhaften und in Gewahrsam bringen leiss."

⁴⁶ Diod. idem, vii. 4; "Ἐξελέξατο δὲ καὶ τῶν φρονήσει διαφερόντων ἀνδρῶν τοὺς ἱκανοὺς, οὓς ἀποδείξας συμβούλους ἐχρήτο συνέδροις αὐτοῖς· τήβεννάν τε περιπόρφυρον περιβάλλετο καὶ πλατύσημον ἔδυν χιτῶνα κατὰ τοὺς χρηματισμούς, καὶ ῥαβδούχους εἶχε μετὰ πελέκεων τοὺς προηγουμένους, καὶ τᾶλλα πάντα ὅσα ποικύσι τε καὶ ἐπικροσμοῦσιν ἐπετήδευε βασιλείαν."

But Tryphon whom we left in a fit of narrow jealousy putting Athenion, the best of the rebel generals, in chains and behind bars, hearing through scouts of the near approach of a great army of Romans and their allies, made haste to consult this rival king and ascertain his views. Athenion advised him not to risk a siege but to confront the Roman in the open field and offer battle.

Tryphon who well knew the judgment of Athenion as a commander and the great influences he possessed over his troops, of whom he had in his own right fully 10,000, acquiesced; and the combined armies of the two kings, in all 40,000 men, marched northward to a place called Scirthæa⁴ and there pitched in line of battle. Opposite at a distance of a mile and a half lay the Roman legions. The offer of battle seems mutually to have been accepted; but which of the two antagonists gave the onset cannot be clearly ascertained. Here stood on the one hand, a great army of 40,000 desperate slaves, flushed with half a dozen victories, burning with the memory of their previous sufferings and anxious for revenge. Their commanders had a sufficient taste of the luxuries of freedom to make them desperate and they were not wanting in the certain knowledge of the terrible fate which awaited defeat. To them and their braves alike, this murderous conflict meant liberty and continued luxury, or else death in the battle-field or upon the ignominious cross. On the side of the Romans, every man knew that defeat by a base legion of runaway slaves was of itself a scandal which reflected alike upon the general and the soldier. The proud senate made it dangerous for him who could not return to the capital with the blood and, as it were, the scalp of the last slave who had dared to defy its arrogant and overbearing prowess. Besides this, there yet remain untold the incentives for the prætors to enrich themselves by plunder—a boon which defeat would deprive them of.

With these contrasting urgents, involving hopes and plans which were to furnish the foundations of history of progress or retrogression for the human race, the two great armies fell into mortal grapple. After a certain amount of sparring and skirmish between the outskirts, the main body of each army closed in with an unwavering clash of arms under which the combatants fell in thousands.⁴⁵ Amid the battle, while the terrible plunges of maddened men with thrusts and din were at their height of fury, Athenion, mounted on a prancing steed, rushed, at the head of a detachment of his cavalry 200 strong, with a certain frenzy which sometimes characterizes life energies when wrought to a tension of reckless excitement. He lunged into the enemy's center, striking down everything before him. No doubt this was a rash action, however magnificent it may seem to the critic of military exploits; for although he made his hated foe tremble with the shock, he received three blows so stunning, though not fatal, that his fellow-slaves on seeing him fall, feeling that in him as in a god, resides alone the genius of victory, fell into a panic. When the soldiers of Athenion shrank back the cry of victory must have been raised by the Romans; for Diodorus tells us that half the slaves, in number 20,000, were either killed or taken prisoners, but that the remaining 20,000 fled back to their defences at Triokala under command of Tryphon who survived. Siefert's suggestion that the rebels lost courage scarcely appears well founded.⁴⁶ We not only find the slaves again in possessing of their fortress of Triocala with Tryphon, but we are told that the rebels kept it; and we are without assurances that they were either captured or driven away. Nor was the gallant Athenion lost to them; for after the catastrophe which may have closed with the sunset, on this great and bloody battle, this hero, taking shelter from harm under cover of night, arose and so far returned to reason and strength that he crawled safely back to the fortress of Triocala with the rest. Thus, considering the severe punishment suffered by the Romans, the fact that they did not pursue, that it was nine days before they arrived before the fortifications of Tryphon and Athenion, and ventured, battered and shattered up to the gates of the rebel fortress, in fine, that they failed altogether of taking the place and experienced thereafter nothing but defeat, is strong circumstantial evidence that Scirthæa was a drawn battle on both sides.

⁴ Diod. XXXVI. frag. viii. 2, 3, 4 and 5. Paragraphs 3 and 4 contain the description of the battle as we give it. q. v.

⁴⁵ Nach einigem Geplänkel kam es zum geordneten Angriff, dessen Erfolg lange herüber und hinüber schwankte." Diodorus, XXXVI, frag. 8 3, says: "Τὸ μὲν οὖν πρῶτον ἐγένοντο συνεχεῖς ἀκροβολισμοί. etc." This skirmishing with light armed troops introduced the general battle.

⁴⁶ Siefert, Italtisch. Sklavenkriege, S. 29: "Da unternahm Athenion mit zweihundert auserwählten Reitern einen Angriff, durch den er Alles vor sich niederwarf. Unglücklicherweise aber wurde er mitten in diesem Erfolge durch drei Wunden kampfunfähig gemacht, worauf die Sklaven, muthlos gemacht, flohen," Diod. XXXVI. frag. viii. 4, who informs us that Athenion when struck down feigned death until night, when he escaped.

Nine days after the Battle of Scirthæa the army of Lucullus appeared in front of the town of Triocala. How many men his army now mustered or how many of the former officers like Cleptius still adorned his ranks, is not definitely given. But they had within the nine days so far recovered from the severe punishment they had received, as to be at least endowed with the boldness to altogether underrate the strength and spirit of their adversary.⁴⁷

Meanwhile Athenion was rapidly recovering from his injuries received at the battle of Scirthæa and was, as we are led to understand by the evidence left us, so far restored that he appeared with all his former valor and vigor. Dr. Siefert who talks about the lost courage of the working men,⁴⁸ naturally enough catching the idea from Florus, says that they now mustered courage to attack the Romans.⁴⁹ Our opinion is, reasoning from appearances which confirm the valiant fighting force, such as must appear to every candid, unbiased reasoner, shows the rebels to have crippled the Romans at the great battle of Scirthæa 9 days before; and that they did not lose courage, but doggedly held their own throughout. Certain it is that another obstinate battle was fought before the fortifications of Triocala. The Romans made the first attack but were received apparently in open field by the rebels. A conflict followed in which the entire strength of both armies was brought to bear. The loss on both sides was very serious. But in this second scene of blood the victory was with the workingmen. Lucullus was completely driven from the field, his camps taken by storm⁵⁰ and his army so scattered from place to place that he seems never to have recovered, but fell to plundering like the slaves and freedmen themselves, appropriating

⁴⁷ Diod. frag. viii. 5.

⁴⁸ We can no longer say slaves. A large proportion of the rebel army was now composed of freedmen, mechanics, laborers, etc.

⁴⁹ Siefert, Sicilische Sklavenkriege, S. 29. "Als Lucullus endlich 9 Tage nach der Schlacht zur Belagerung der Veste schritt, war der erschütterte Muth schon wieder befestigt."

⁵⁰ Florus, lib. III. cap. XIX. "Lucullo capta castra—vicos, oppida, castella diripiens," referring to Athenion. Siefert, S. 29, speaking of Lucullus, says: "ja sein Lager soll sogar von den Sklaven erstürmt worden sein." See note 76 where Siefert refers to Cic. Verr. II. 52; "Athenionem cui nullum opidum cepit," remarks: "Bei Cicero ist der Zweck ins Auge zu fassen."

the funds entrusted to him, to his own use and with defeat, avarice and demoralization was rendered hors de combat altogether.

What had in the mean time been going on between the two rival slave-kings, Tryphon and Athenion, no one can tell. We only know that the former, after the battle of Tricala had died⁵¹ and that Athenion had been elected king over all the rebels, including slaves and freedmen. Perhaps a dark deed of revenge or of jealousy may have been committed; more humanely let us foster the conjecture that Tryphon had lost his life in some valorous charge which secured the victory to the slaves, in the desperate battle we have just recounted.

The year B. C. 102 had thus rolled by and not only was another large prætorean army of the Romans annihilated but the rebels with Athenion, their veteran general at their head, were complete masters of Sicily.

Rome under this extraordinary condition of things, sent C. Servilius, B. C. 102, with another prætorian army under orders from the senate to leave no means untried whereby to stamp out the rebellion. This Roman commander and prætor must have landed his army at Massana on the so-called Etruscum fretum, now the Straits of Messina; and judging from appearances the first battle may not have occurred at a long distance from there. It is not certain but that the Romans marched in a southwesterly direction for many miles into the interior before the two armies met. We only know that the combatants sought and found each other and that there was another encounter; of course, one of those fierce and internecine struggles in which great numbers of brave men are occasionally mowed down, but whose numbers, memory and place are, for shame, pitched into the dark grottoes of oblivion. Florus shuffles the fact over to posterity with language provokingly crisp and indicative of mortification and distaste;⁵² Cicero denies;⁵³ Dion Cassius⁵⁴ is in tatters at the Vatican; Diodorus lies ⁵¹ Diod. XXXVI. 1. "Τελευτήσαντες δὲ Τρύφωνος, διάδοχος τῆς ἀρχῆς ὁ Ἀθηνίων καθίσταται, καὶ τοῦτο μὲν πόλεις ἐπολιόρκει," etc.

⁵² Flor. Epitom. Populi Romani. III. 19. "Athenio—vicos, oppida, castella diripiens"

⁵³ Cic. Verræ, II. 54. "Athenion qui nullum oppidum cepit." This however, we think innocently refers to the fact that Athenion's policy was from the first, not to take the fortified towns; since Eunus and Cleon in taking this course had lost their cause.

contorted into the tell-tale mutterings of his fragments;⁵⁴ Livy leaves only the paltry exordium of his epitomies.⁵⁵ But enough of these is still extant, together with the circumstantial evidence such as the disgrace by the Roman Senate, of the defeated prætors and their exile for life, and continued ravages of the war for years; all these verified facts prove the words of Florus, to the effect that Servilius and Athenion met in some undescribed and mortal fray; that the proud slave-king won a complete victory; and that labor from its points of irascibility and vengeance was once more vindicated. Such is not only our own rendering of the real meaning of the vague words left us but they are as conscientiously read by others.⁵⁶

After this important and probably great battle which was the fifth in number since the outbreak of the war and which from our authority we may call the battle of Florus, the Roman general, either disheartened or prone to enrich himself like his predecessors, with plunder and malfesance, or still more probably, being utterly annihilated, left the strikers with Athenion at their head, complete masters of the field. They ravaged and laid waste the country on every side, destroying castles, towns and cities. Athenion next turned his wrath toward Messina. Reaching it by forced marches, he stealthily at night surprised the inhabitants of that city as they were engaged in its outskirts celebrating the sacrifices to their gods, and cut them to pieces, taking quantities of plunder which he made off with. But he steered shy of the city itself, keeping apparently in mind the danger of being hemmed in, and the dreadful results which, in the previous rebellion under Eunus, had caused the great catastrophe.

Athenion after marching through the northeastern portions of Sicily⁵⁷ gathering wealth by plunder, struck a westerly tack and the next we hear from him, is at the ancient walled

⁵⁴ Dion Cassius, excerpt, 101. Peiresio; Diod. XXXVI. ix. 1 and 2.

⁵⁵ Livy, Epitome, LXIX. fin. "M. Aquilius proconsul excitatum confecit."

⁵⁶ Giefert, Italische Sklavenkriege, S. 30. "Athenion, der nach dem inzwischen erfolgten Tode des Tryphon, König der Sklaven geworden war, trat ihm (Servilius) mit grosser Kühnheit entgegen und schlug ihn aus dem Felde; nachdem auch das Lager des Servilius einmal genommen war, wagte dieser sich nicht mehr zum Kampfe hervor, und Athenion konnte ungehindert das Land durchstreifen, kastele und kleinere Städte einnehmen."

⁵⁷ Much obscurity enshrouds both the history and topography of this place. Livy, lib. XXVI. 21, speaks of the place as being obscure. "Secutæ defectionem earum Hybla et Macella sunt ignobilioresque quædam aliæ." This mention refers to B. C. 21..

town of Macella supplied with a castle or citadel. It is situated southeastward of Segesta and not more than 40 miles to the eastward of Lilybæum. Here he established and fortified himself, B. C. 101, the third year of the war; supplying his army with the products of the fruitful country around him.⁵⁸

During this time C. Marius and M. Aquillius had been elected consuls at Rome, and it was resolved to send a full consular army to Sicily and thus put an end to the war at once. Accordingly Aquillius, during the year 101, arrived in the island with a consular army consisting of a large force of veteran Romans and other soldiers. The terrible handling which the people of Sicily who had remained hostile to Athenion, had received, made them eager to grasp this new offer of succor; and it cannot be doubted that large numbers of the defeated fragments of the armies of Lucullus and Servilius were mustered in, swelling the consular army to a host. Aquillius proved, for the first time, a match for the redoubtable strikers.

Whether the Romans landed at Messana or at the port of Ægesta in the vicinity of Macella where the army of Athenion lay, is not easy to determine. The distance from the Ostia or port of Rome by water, direct to Ægesta, or to Messana is by fifty miles in favor of a landing at Ægesta; and to have gone by way of Messana would have cost the consul a march of 150 miles from there to Macella, on the head waters of the Scamander, over a country already laid waste by the army of his foe. We cannot but assume that these two desperate generals met at, or near Macella; for Diodorus tells us that Athenion, true to his old resolution never to let the Romans hem him into a walled town, marched out in full force to meet him.⁵⁹

A great battle was fought. When the two chiefs espied each other, they rushed together in mortal duel.⁶⁰ Athenion, ⁵⁸ Ptolemy the ancient geographer mentions it as being in the interior of the island. See Universal Geography, III. 4, 14. Whereas Polybius, I. 24: κατὰ τὴν ἐκ τῆς Αἰγέστης ἀναχώρησιν Μάκελλαν πόλιν κατὰ κράτος εἶλον. This puts the place far to the west near Athenion's possible birthplace; Dion Cassius, Exc. 104: Χωρίον δὲ τὶ Μάκελλαν εὐερκὲς τειχισάμενος, etc. Siefert imagines this to refer to the town in the neighborhood of Messana. Polybius is however right; in proof of which we refer the critic to Arrowsmith's Orbis Terrarum Veterum Descriptio. Lond. 1822.

⁵⁹ "Athenion stellte sich dem Aquillius in offener Feldschlacht entgegen." Siefert, S. 30. Florus, III. 19, but he may have referred to the successful sieges by Aquillius, of the fugitives after their defeat.

⁶⁰ Dion Cassius, frag. 104.

almost exactly like Spartacus at his last and great battle of Silarius, struck out for his illustrious antagonist, determined with his own hand, to wreak vengeance and thus cross out accounts with Rome's highest and proudest source of power. The men were equally brave and gifted in the sabre's use. How long the duel lasted is not told; but we are distinctly informed that this time it was the slave-king's turn to receive the mortal thrust.⁶¹ Aquillius was a tiger in combat and though he received heavy blows on the head and in his breast he was the fortunate of the two combatants.⁶² Athenion, pierced and dying, fell bleeding at the consul's feet.

Again, as at the battle of Scirthæa, the warriors of Athenion lost courage at the fall of their beloved leader, who this time was finished and never rose to their rescue as before. All but a fragment of 20,000 workingmen were killed or taken prisoners. These fled to the mountains close at hand, but were followed by Aquillius with so much energy that in two years time they were nearly exterminated.

Manius Aquillius afterwards wrote at Capua an inscription which is still extant and quoted in the archæological collection of Orelli, to the effect that when he was prætor in Sicily he had busied himself hunting down runaway slaves and had returned to their masters as many as 917 of them.⁶³ This very interesting inscription sheds a flame of corroboratory light upon that immense uprising and substantiates the history of the affair, as we have extracted it from the fragments. It also adds to history the statement that the Sicilian slaves had reinforcements from Italy.⁶⁴

The awful scenes of crucifixion⁶⁵ as in the case of the re-

⁶¹ Diod., XXXVI. x. 1, which corresponds with Siefert. S. 30, "Athenion stellte sich dem Aquillius in offener Feldschlacht entgegen, fiel aber in derselben durch die Hand des Consuls, der selbst an Kopf und Brust verwundet wurde."

⁶² Diod. XXXVI. x. 1. Καὶ πρὸς αὐτὸν δὲ τὸν βασιλέα τῶν ἀποστατῶν Ἀθηνίωνα συμβαλὼν, ἥρωικόν ἀγῶνα συνετήσατο. Καὶ ταῦτον μὲν ἀνείλεν, αὐτὸς δ' εἰς τὴν κεφαλὴν τραυθεὶς ἐθεραπεύθη.

⁶³ Orellius, Inscriptionum Latinarum Collectio, No. 3, 308. "Eidem prætor in Sicilia fugivos Italicorum conquæsisivei rediditque dominis DCCCCXVII."

⁶⁴ Shortly after this war another broke out in Italy which lasted some time; but although it was of so much importance that several of the historians wrote valuable descriptions of it in their books, the vandals succeeded in destroying the pages and we have only some fragments left in an almost illegible form. We have however, in chapter viii. succeeded in picking out many of the prominent events of the Italian slave and freedmen or tramp war of this era, q. v.

⁶⁵ The evidences for this are indeed vague except by inference. Florus, III. 19, says Supplicium," which with him and Livy always implies the worst. But that almost every one of the captured rebels was crucified, must, by implication be accepted even almost without evidence, other than the well-known, implacable, inexorable Roman Law, which hung such malefactors of the servile race upon the ignominious cross.

bellion 80 years before, were now rehearsed and many a captured slave perished on the cross.

But there still remained at least one strong man named Satyros who, with the other bold lieutenants of Athenion, fell to marauding and in spite of the efforts of the proconsul prolonged the struggle⁶⁶ for two years. Satyros and his men were however, in B. C. 99, all captured and taken to Rome, under the promise solemnly conferred by the Roman general, that as a condition of capitulation they should be exempt from punishment and treated with honor as prisoners of war. The perfidious wretch had no sooner gotten the prisoners in safety to Rome, than he offered them to the aristocracy as the basis of a great triumph or ovation which he claimed, as an honor to the hero who had suppressed the rebellion. The poor creatures were dragged into the arena on a given day, and told that instead of liberty, their horrible doom was to amuse the ladies of Rome and others, who for love of show frequented the amphitheatre to view the bloody contests of gladiators. Not only were they destined to this but they must fight wild beasts like slaves. The great auditorium was crowded with spectators, among whom beat true hearts for humanity and fairness. A characteristic of the great gladiatorial games always had been and still was at that time, that of democracy. All classes, rich, poor, the eminent and the lowly alike had seats; and as there was at that moment a fierce war of tactics raging between the labor organizations and the aristocracy and as a strong partisanship existed against Aquilius and every one of the prætors who had been sent out against the slaves and freedmen fighting for liberty in Sicily, it was very natural that such a party would numerously attend the great ovation, if for nothing more than to pick up points against this aristocrat whom they hated.

When the convicts arrived in chains, trembling with disappointment and broken hearts and like the wild lions, tigers and hyenas they were to fight, found themselves thrust loose and suddenly given knives and other weapons, they all mutually, in presence of the great throng frenzied with wine, nervously betting, many in anticipation of beholding blood spurting from their naked forms, solemnly agreed to become each others' mutual exterminators.

⁶⁶ Livy, LXIX. Epit. ad fin. "M. Aquilius proconsul in Sicilia bellum civile excitatum confecit. Marius was one of the consuls of this year, and Diodorus tells us that Aquilius was the other. This looks doubtful. Rome was at that moment involved in the fierce agrarian agitations; Cf. id., "et cum legem agrariam per vim tullisset," etc. True, Livy may refer to his proconsulship as being the extension of his service in Sicily through the next two years, (B. C. 99), as the war did not close for 2 years after the battle. Again this may rectify the discrepancy in Aquilius' inscription. See note 61.

Satyros led the mutual fratricide. Seizing their weapons they rushed upon each other with all the fury to which they had for 5 years been wont. The audience were thrilled and astonished. The heroic fellows, one after another, fell, gashed and pierced with their own daggers; while the remaining warriors, girding their courage by the excitement and din, drove the knife deep into each others' brave hearts. All had fallen and lay gasping, the hot blood draining their bodies of both spirit and vitality. Satyros, the powerful Greek, was still upon his feet. Without faltering he drove his weapon deep into his own breast and thus triumphantly expired.

This magnificent stroke of courage recoiled badly against the perfidious Aquillius who had treacherously lied them out of their lives. The word rang out that the glory of these brave men's fall was infinitely grander than that of the wretch whose vanity was to be puffed by an ovation.⁶⁷ A reaction then and there set in against the fellow and one L. Fufius, soon afterwards brought suit against him for extortion and malfeasance which was so energetically pressed that the great orator Antonius had to be engaged to save his life. He was retained for the trial and succeeded only by seizing Aquillius, and tearing open his clothing during an impassioned gush of eloquence, and exhibiting to the people the wounds which he had actually received in the duel with Athenion at the battle before Macella.⁶⁸ But even this did not save the fellow's life; for where there lurks an enemy in public opinion there also lurks a means. Aquillius who afterwards fell a prisoner to Mithridates was taken to Pergamus and in a horrible manner was tied back down upon a stone and held there while the gold melters poured a ladle full of melted gold down his throat.⁶⁹

⁶⁷ Viele meinten, grösser sei der Ruhm der Gefallenen als der Ruhm des überlebenden Siegers." Sicilische Sklavenkriege, S. 31.

⁶⁸ Livy, Epitome to book LXX. "Cum M. Aquilius de pecuniis repetundis causam diceret, ipse iudices rogare noluit. M. Antonius, qui pro eo perorabat, tunicam a pectore ejus discidit, ut honestas cicatrices ostenderet, indubitantur absolutus est."

⁶⁹ Pliny, Nat. Hist. XXXIII, 14. "Nec jam Quiritium aliquo, sed universo nomine Romano infami, rex Mithridates Aquilio duci capto, aurum in os infudit."

Lucullus and Servilius, the prætors whom Athenion had defeated and driven from Sicily, as we have related, were also both accused of robbery and malfeasance in office and banished from Rome into perpetual exile.⁷⁰

⁷⁰ It is hardly to be wondered at that early commentators misunderstand the true principles involved in this great war, or that they misapply the true facts in the case. Both Granier and O'Brien fail to comprehend at all that there existed a socialistic cult of great but secret influence which had a powerful effect upon the minds of the men involved in all those troubles. Granier, Histoire des Classes Ouvrières, p. 496, characterizes them as "bandits," as follows: "Un trait fort caractéristique, et qui fut commun à Eunus et à Athénion, c'est qu'en se révoltant ils n'eurent ni l'un ni l'autre l'idée d'abolir l'esclavage et d'établir l'égalité. A peine au milieu de leurs armées, ils se hâtèrent d'oublier qu'ils avaient le cou pelé par la chaîne, et de goûter avec délices les prérogatives de la seigneurie, D'abord, ce qui est facile à croire, les châteaux, les villages, les villes, furent mis au pillage." So Mr. James Bronterre O'Brien, an honest and kind-hearted writer who devoted his life to his fellow-men, amid persecutions, likewise misunderstands the ancients. He says (Rise, Progress and Phases of Human Slavery, p. 81), speaking of upholding the dignity of human nature, that in these conflicts "there was nothing of the sort. The harsh conduct of masters and the violation of workhouse rules were the motive power of each revolt." The fact is that the workhouses he mentions were, as we have shown, dungeons, often underground and intolerable hells; and those poor people were chained down in them, and in the morning marched in chains to the fields. The systematized workhouses with which these writers become confounded, were those of the later Augustan age. To get into the ergastulum of Sicily or Italy before the emperors, was a serious thing, and we know of no rules whatever in Sicily restricting the master's will. He could kill his slave or keep him without rule. Mr. O'Brien and M. Granier de Cassagnac are both entirely wrong in saying that there was neither premeditation nor purpose in these great revolts. They charge against Eunus and Athenion that "they began forthwith to ape the pomp and the circumstance of their oppressors." Every action of Eunus and of Athenion on the contrary, was incontestably pre-determined; and the fire-spitting prestigation of Eunus and Satyros, as well as the purple and silver staff of Athenion, were indispensable to inspire their uncouth, superstitious soldiers with feelings of awe and reverence, necessary to order and discipline. In fact this was the key to their success.

CHAPTER XII.

SPARTACUS.

THE IRASCIBLE PLAN TESTED ON AN ENORMOUS SCALE.

RISE, VICISSITUDES and Fall of a Great General—The Strike of the Gladiators—Grievances that led to the Trouble—Growth of Slavery through Usurpation of the Land by the arrogant Optimates—What is known of Spartacus before being Sold into Slavery—Bolt of the 78 Gladiators from the Ergastulum of Lentulus at Capua—Escape of the Runaways—How they seized Weapons—Vesuvius—First Battle—Battle of the Cliffs—Rout of Clodius—Second Battle—Destruction of a Prætorian Army—Battle of the Mineral Baths—Great Increase of the Rebel Force—From a petty Strike it assumes the Proportions of Revolution—Fourth Battle; Hilt to Hilt with Varinius—Destruction of the Main Army of the Romans—Winter Quarters of Spartacus at Metapontem—Honor, Discipline and Temperance of the Workingmen—Proofs by Pliny and Plutarch—Coalition with the Organized Laborers of Italy—Uses of Gold and other Ornaments Forbidden—Wine Banned—Great Numbers Employed in the Armories of Spartacus—Fifth Battle—Battle of Mt. Garganus—Ambuscade of Arrius—Overthrow and Death of Crixus—Sixth Battle—Spartacus Destroys the Consular Army of Poplicola—Seventh Battle—Great Conflict of the River Po—Overthrow of Cassius and Defeat of the 10,000 Romans—Spartacus, now Master, assumes the Offensive—Eighth Battle—Lentulus Defeated; Great Army nearly annihilated—Mortification and Terror of the Romans—Ninth Battle—Mutina—Proconsul Cassius again Routed in a Disastrous Conflict with the wary Gladiator—Spartacus now obliged to contend with the Demon of Insubordination—Crassus elected Consul—Reverses Begin—On down to Rhegium—Sedition, Treachery, Betrayal—Workingmen's own Jealousies, Insubordination and Lack of Diplomacy cause their final Ruin—Tenth Battle—Scaling of the Six Mile Ramparts by Spartacus—Battle of Croton—Destruction of the Seceders, Granicus and Castus—Obstinate Fighting—Spartacus arrives and checks the Carnage—Pettelia, the Eleventh Battle—Victory—Twelfth Battle; Silarus—Last and most Bloody Encounter—Spartacus, stabbing his Horse, Rushes sword drawn, in search of Crassus—Heaps of the slain—Dying like a King—End of the War—The great Supplicium—Pompey and Crassus, emulous of meagre Honors—Inhuman Cruelties—Awful Wreaking of Vengeance on the Cross—Dangling Bodies of 6,000 Crucified Workingmen along the Appian Way—Thousands of Others crucified—Utter Failure of the Irascible Plan of Deliverance.

As physical science informs us of convulsions in nature called by geologists, the Permian age which brought the palæozoic era to an end and left, after its prodigious upheavals, the calm in which we live, so historical fragments and palæographs inform us of great social cataclysms immediately preceding the immense calm that began to envelop human society during the reign of Augustus, rooted into it by the visit and labors of Jesus. The desperate social upheaval here referred to—the last in the line—was that of the gladiators under Spartacus, B. C. 74–70.

In introducing this mighty conflict of Spartacus—the greatest and last of all the ancient struggles coming into our categories of the “irascible” against the “concupiscent,” and undertaken by labor, in its plan of salvation from the horrors of slavery and suffering—we find it necessary to sketch an outline of the condition which matters were in during the century preceding the advent of Jesus, who was the next reformer in chronological order.

Of all the methods of systematic cruelty practiced upon the ancient lowly, that of the gladiatorial games excelled; and it is our duty, in order that the reader may see the whole truth laid bare, which actuated this rebellion, to quote a few specimen descriptions of that ferocious amusement, from the authors and the slabs. Athenæus, quoting the lost work of Nicolaus Damascenus, describes in unmistakable language, the horrible custom common at that time. He says it was a common thing for rich men to invite guests to dinner and after the wine and other intoxicating stimulants began to madden them, to introduce gladiators into some ring or private amphitheatre. As these poor creatures, driven by the foreman to fight, cut each others' throats, boisterous applause and laughter at the scene were indulged in. Sometimes beautiful women were thus forced to attack and butcher each other in the same manner as the men. Large sums of money were paid for these innocent victims, for no other purpose than to toy with this inhuman passion in the male and female guests, for beholding atrocities of this ghastly nature while they wallowed in inebriate and lascivious beastliness. Often small children were driven naked into the arena, given knives, and forced, for the amusement of these truculent nobles, to struggle in the awful qualms of danger and death until the little innocents, one or more, fell dying in their bath of blood.¹

Gladiatorial games, as we have shown in our chapter, on amusements, were the real origin of wakes; and of this we possess the evidence of Valerius Maximus. Some 264 years before Christ, two brothers named Marcus and Decimus Brutus, on the death of their father, a lord of a gens, possessing slaves, held in his honor and at his funeral, a gladiatorial combat. There being no amphitheatre at that early date, the Forum Boarium was used, and a permit was granted by the city. Appius Claudius and M. Fulvius were the consuls.² One need not wonder that a licence was granted to butcher workingmen by a monster like Appius Claudius. He hated them and was struggling to suppress them and their unions even at that early time. Thyse, who arranged the Lugdunum edition of Valerius Maximus, adds that slaves were sacrificed on funeral occasions of such men.³ The origin then is fetish and belongs to, and must, like many other inhuman rites, and practices, be charged to religion.

¹ Schambach, Der Italische Sklavenaufstand, S. 7-8, quotes in proof of this, Nicolaus Damascenus, indirectly as follows: "In dem gewaltigen Geschichtswerke des Nicolaus Damascenus wurde der Sklavenkrieg in 110, Buche gehandelt, aus dem uns bei Athen, IV, pag. 153 F. (fragm. 84 bei Müller fragm. hist. graec. III. pag. 417) ein Fragment erhalten ist, welches in der von M. gegebenen lateinischen Uebersetzung, die ich der Allgemeinverständlichkeit wegen statt des griechischen Textes hier gebe, folgendermassen lautet: Nicolaus Damascenus, Peripateticae sectae philosophus, libro historiarum decimo supra centesimum Romanos scribit inter coenandum gladiatorum paria committere solitos, his verbis: gladiatorum autem spectacula non solum in publicis conventibus et amphitheatris edunt Romani, invecito ab Etruscis more, sed etiam inter epulas. Itaque amicos ad coenam invitant interdum, tum ut alia, tum ut duo triave gladiatorum paria dimicantia his exhibeant. Igitur postquam vino ac dapibus sese ingurgitarunt, introduci jubent gladiatores; quorum ubi quis jugulatur, universi convivae plau sunt eo spectaculo exhilarati. Quidam etiam in testamento jussit mulieres formosas, quas emerat, ferro inter se dimicare; alius item pueros impuberes, quos in deliciis habuerat. Sed populus eam atrocitatem detestatus testamentum eorum irritum esse jussit. Das Ganze macht den Eindruck, als habe es zur Motivierung des Aufstandes gedient."

² Valerius Maximus, De Spectaculis, 7; "Gladiatorium munus primum Romae datum est in foro boario, Ap. Claudio, M. Fulvio Coss. dederunt M. & D. Bruti, funebri memoria patris eius honorando. Athletarum certamen a M. Scauri tractum est munificentia."

As an instance that gladiators were the game of priests and priestcraft not only at Rome, but even in North America among the less ancient Aztecs, we may cite Bancroft, on the Nahuas. He says, speaking of the feast of Xipe: "The next day another batch of prisoners called oavanti, whose top hair had been shaved, were brought out for sacrifice. In the meantime a number of young men also named tototecti, began a gladiatorial game, a burlesque on the real combat to follow, dressing themselves in the skins of the flayed (human) victims."

The story of these victims is told on the preceding page as follows: "Let us now proceed with the feast of Xipe. We left a part of the doomed victims on their way to death. Arrived at the summit of the temple each one is led in turn to the altar of sacrifice, seized by the grim, merciless priests, and thrown upon the stone; the high-priest draws near, the knife is lifted, there is one great cry of agony, a shuffle of feet as the assistants are swayed to and fro by the death-struggles of their victim, then all is silent save the mutterings of the high-priest as high in air he holds the smoking heart, while from far down beneath comes a low hum of admiration from the thousands of upturned faces."

This picture almost exactly corresponds with the gladiatorial horrors of the time of Spartacus at Rome, Capua

³ Thysii, Recensio nova Lugd. Batavorum, 1651: "Gladiatorum munus. Origo Gladiatorum à re funebri: exemplum ab Hetrusclis. At fortasse Hetrusci ipsi à Græcis. Undecunque exemplum, causa tamen and origo funus. Nam quoniam olim animas defunctorum humano sanguine propitiari creditum erat, captivos vel alto ingenio servos mercati in exsequiis immolabant. Postea placuit impietatem voluptate adumbrare: itaque duos paraverant, armis quibus tunc et qualiter poterant eruditos, mox edicto die feriarum, apud tumulos erogabant. Hæc muneris origo. Atque Gladiatores illi à busti cineribus Bustuarii dicti. Lipsius. Gladiatorum munus. Vulgo, gladiatorum, quod gladiatorum Livio aliisque dicitur; non enim gladiatorum munus illud erat, sed ejus qui gladiatores pugnantes populo exhibebat." pp. 170-171.

⁴ Bancroft, Native Races, Vol. II, pp. 358-359. These horrors were extracted from the histories of Las Casas, Clavigero, Gomorra and others. The Christians were furious against the practice and broke it up, for which they have been maligned. There seems indeed no doubt that in breaking it up they committed faults; but the great anti-slavery movement of Las Casas, which warred against every cruelty, freed Mexico from these two pests long ago.

and hundreds of provincial towns all over Italy. Where history fails the inscriptions come to the front with their irrepressible language, making up the gaps. These are seemingly innumerable. A peculiar character resembling the Greek theta expresses the violent death of the gladiator mentioned on the slab. Orelli's catalogue entitled Re Scenica teems with them.* As a rule they may be considered epitaphs; for after the dead gladiator had been dragged off the sands his body was generally given up to his friends, some of whom were organized in the numerous unions, and hence the occasional laudatory words of his character, his affection for his family, his skill in the use of weapons.

But nothing is more certain than that these poor people had a mutual or reciprocatory terror of these scenes which were almost sure to terminate only with their lives.

When M. Valerius Laevinus died B. C. 200, his sons forced fifty of the old man's slaves to begore his grave with their blood. Flaminius, 25 years later, on the occasion of his father's death, caused 74 gladiators who had been hired for the service, to balm with their blood his ghost about to be deposited under the sacred hearth. The emperor Trajan once ordered a vast gladiatorial orgie lasting 123 days. Not less than 10,000 gladiators were obliged to fight and die in the combat for the worse than beastly gratification of that degenerate humanity.

* Orellius, Inscriptionum Latinarum Selectarum Collectio, Nos. 2,551. "Poetellus, Syrus, lanista ad Aram Forinarum ubi negotiatorem familiæ gladiatoris habes; 2,552 is a slab on which are lettered certain data about one Cornelius Frontin; how he won liberty at the great games and liberty for his children. It was found on the Applan Way and catalogued by Mur. No. 620, 4, 2,554; 2,555 is one of which considerable mention has been made: "Inscriptiones gladiatoris in Opere musivo Romæ asservato apud Marini, Atti. 1, p. 165." It is two inscriptions in one, recording the death by the steel of both "Astianax. vicit. Kalendio" (death), Astianax, Kalendio (death or killed). Quibus pugnantibus Simmachus ferrum Maternus habilis misit." So No. 2,556, remarkable inscriptions discovered at Pompeii, showing that gladiators fought with wild beasts. Romenelli, Viaggio a Pompeii. Rome, I, p. 82. Another (No. 2,545), tells in the words of an epitaph, more than a chapter of history. A gladiator has fought eight times in these games before he fell, and so skillfully had he dispatched his fellow adversaries whom the betters had pitted against him that he received floral decorations and much applause. But we have not space to mention more than a few of the extremely numerous specimens. As to the average years which gladiators lived we find these data carefully figured by Schambach from the inscriptions of Orelli as follows: "Ueber sein Alter" (meaning the age of Spartacus) "ist uns zwar von den Alten nichts berichtet; trotzdem macht dieser Punkt noch nicht die größten Schwierigkeiten. Das man zu rechter vorwiegend Leute in jungen oder mittleren Lebensjahren wählte, ist natürlich die erhaltenen Sepulcralinschriften auf gefallenem Fechter bestätigen dies. Wir finden in den Inscr. lat. ed Hagenb. et Orelli folgende Todesjahre verzeichnet: 22 (nr. 2,572), 27 (nr. 2,592), 30 (nr. 2,571), 46 (nr. 2,590). und schwerlich wird das zuletzt angegebene Lebensjahr öfters überschritten sein. Wir werden also nicht weit fehl gehen, wenn wir uns Spartacus als einen Mann zwischen 30 und 40 vorstellen." Italischer Sklavenaufstand, S. 15-16.

At Capua, Pompeii, Præneste, Ravenna, Alexandria in upper Etruria, even in Gaul and among the Germans, these games of gladiatorial carnage were fashionable. Commodus upheld them, Domitian extended them, and finally, and to their shame be it said, even the Christians themselves left the noble principles and precepts of their master and for the paltry baubles of adulation and of imperial favor, fell back into the ghastly heathenism of the amphitheatre.⁶ But fortunately for future civilization, this did not occur until the cult of the so-called early Christians had firmly taken root among workingmen, the terrible system's victims; and even to this day it is this element that alone is manfully fighting and resisting cruelty.

De Quincey, in his characteristic language, tells the story of Caligula who took delight in feeding the wild animals of the amphitheatres with the quivering flesh of human beings. He brings his story in, incidentally, as an instance as follows:

"On some occasion it happened that a dearth prevailed, either generally of cattle, or of such cattle as were used for feeding the wild beasts reserved for the bloody exhibitions of the amphitheatre. Food could be had and perhaps at no very exorbitant price, but on terms somewhat higher than the ordinary market price. A slight excuse served with Caligula for acts the most monstrous. Instantly repairing to the public jails and causing all the prisoners to pass in review before him custodiarum seriem recognoscens, he pointed to two bald-headed men, and ordered that the whole file of the intermediate persons should be marched off to the dens of the wild beasts. 'Tell them off' said he, 'from the bald man to the bald man.' Yet these were prisoners committed, not for punishment, but trial."⁷

From the earliest times of which history gives any record, brigandage or marauding was not only common but in many countries quite popular.⁸ It was the natural outcome

⁶ Guhl and Koner, Life of the Greeks and Romans, pp. 554-566.

⁷ De Quincy, Ancient Histories and Antiquities, pp. 88-9.

⁸ Carey, Principles of Social Science, Vol. I p. 139. Rent is original brigandage differentiated by refinement. "Opportunity makes the robber, and the most daring among them becomes the leader of the band. One by one, the people of the competitive system, forcing the patricians or gens families of high-born rank, to co-operate with each other, and in Greece, to form interprotective fratries, in Rome, curies,⁹ which may be regarded as first evidences of that differentiation that made nations out of isolated families.¹⁰ Much of this marauding spirit was the result of their abuse practiced against slaves whose intelligent sensibilities to maltreatment they little understood. Although those slaves had neither social or political liberty they had minds and strong physical vitality.¹¹ These they often used in self defense. It was not uncommon for them to take control of their own lives, escape into the mountains whose caverns and jungles afforded them protection, and organize nightly expeditions against those whom they considered their common foe. Some of them became bold and chivalrous bandits. Only on extremely rare occasions does their history appear in the writings of the chroniclers of their times probably because of the contempt for them as being mere property, which was entertained by the ruling society, whose interests the historians were often forced to serve.

Historians were mostly of the aristocratic or noble stock; because, as their business was to record the deeds of heroes, the laboring race was considered too insignificant to do that work. So in earlier times soldiers were of nobler stock than workingmen, for the same reason. Thus we find in almost every instance, that historians were of noble blood, while sculptors, architects, poets and teachers were descendents from the slaves.¹² who desire to live by their own labor are plundered; and thus are they who prefer the work of plunder enabled to pass their time in dissipation. The leader divides the spoil, and with its help is enabled to augment the number of his followers, and thus to enlarge the sphere of his depredations. With the gradual increase of the little community, he is led, however, to commute with them for a certain share of their produce, which he calls rent, or tax, or taille."

⁹ For an interesting discussion of the gentes or gentiles which we designate the gens families, see Morgan's Ancient Society, Chapter II, pp. 62-70.

¹⁰ Florus, lib. III, cap. 20. §1, (Fisher) denies this, unable to understand the possibility of equality by merit. "Nam etsi ipsi (meaning slaves as compared with gladiators) per fortunam in omnia obnoxii; tamen quasi secundum hominum genus sunt." (Note C).

¹¹ Fustel de Coulanges, La Cité Antique, p. 118, chap. X. "La signification vraie de familia est propriété: elle désigne le champ, la maison, l'argent, les esclaves, etc." The word thus developed politically and covered cities and nations.

¹² Granier, Histoire des Classes Ouvrières, chap. XVI. Also chap. XI, pp. 243-244; Lucian, Somnium, §. 6-9; Consult Drumann's remarks Arbeiter und Communisten in Griechenland und Rom., S. 29-30. Miller, Origin of Ranks, chap. VI, p. 243: "The ancient institution by which every one who is able to bear arms

Among the most remarkable of the workingmen of ancient days whose genius revolted into rebellion against the servile condition, was Spartacus. Judging from piecemeal evidence, scantily, and we might also say, stingily announced by the historians of his time, the deeds of Spartacus, for valor, for success, for magnitude, and for the terror they struck into the hearts of the proud Romans, were equal if not superior to those of Hannibal. The more our investigation of the darkened facts reveals the sagacity and purity of this man, the more profound becomes the respect and the more intense the admiration for him by all true lovers of gallantry and freedom. In fact, there are interests astir in the human breast which must lead to a more searching acquaintance with the fountains at the social penetrakia of the times, that bubbled forth under his terrible hand and shook the social and political world from center to surface, paling the senators and tribunes at Rome.

Spartacus was, in all respects a workingman. He had no ornamental initials attached to his name, such as betoken any claim to privileged ancestry. It was simply Spartacus.¹³ is required to appear in the field at his own charge." This of itself precludes the lowly who have no such economical means, from being soldiers, and shows the entire absence in the early ages, of the now prevailing socialistic mode of levying and supporting armies by the state. See also Guhl and Koner, Life of the Greeks and Romans: "The contempt against trades expressed by Cicero is further illustrated by the fact of tradesmen being with few exceptions debarred from serving in the legions;" Drumann, Idem Römischer Abschnitt, S. 106, sq. Dichter, confirms the statements that poets, artists and other workers were of the lowly class.

¹³ Flor., III, 20, 1. "Bellum Spartaco duce concitatum quo nomine appellem nescio." Mommsen, History of Rome, vol. IV, p. 102, Harpers' ed., tries, because his deeds were of so prodigious a magnitude, to make him a member of a noble family of the Spartocids; but the name he trumps up to serve this silly conceit is not Spartacus all; it was Spardokos, and the family was far from the home of our hero while the time of their career was equally distant. Mommsen's exact words translated are: "Spartacus, perhaps a scion of the noble family of the Spartocids which attained even to royal honors in its Thracian home and in Panticapæum, had served among the Thracian auxiliaries in the Roman army, had deserted and gone as a brigand to the mountains, and had been there recaptured and destined for the gladiatorial games." Schambach makes this vaguely conjectural, and succeeds only in repeating the well-known fact that in Thrace the name Sportox, Sportokos and Spardokas was about as common as our name Smith. He says, (Italische Sklavenaufstand, S. 15): "Dass Spartacus von Geburt ein Thraker gewesen, darin stimmen alle Nachrichten überein; Plutarch fügt noch hinzu, er habe einem Nomadenstamme angehört. Eine thrakische Stadt gleichen Namens wird von Stephanus von Byzanz, s. v. erwähnt; aus Thuc. II, 101 lernen wir einen Glied des odrystischen Königshauses kennen, das den Namen Σπάρδοκος führt. Durch Inschriften und Münzen ist uns bezeugt, das in dem bosporanischen Herrscherhause der name Σπάρτοκος öfters vorkam. Vgl. Böckh corp. inscr. gr. II, 91. Möglich, das auch unser Spartacus in seiner Heimat den Rang eines Häuptlings schon bekleidet hat."

Like all other prominent persons without the prestige of high rank to build from, Spartacus rose by his own genius. He arose amongst his fellow slaves in the year 74 before Christ. This was precisely the time corresponding with the movement of the Roman Senate to suppress the right of organization;¹⁴ and serves as additional evidence that the suppression of organization among working people was followed by a great struggle. The first appearance of Spartacus appears to have been sixteen years before the law was passed suppressing the ancient right of organization.¹⁵ It seems evident, that threats against the Jus coeundi, or law permitting free organization, were, at the time Spartacus makes his appearance, being pushed, with great fury by the nobility, on the slim pretext that they were corrupting the politics as well as the general morals of Rome.¹⁶ But we know from the accounts of the Gracchi that a furious dissention was all along, raging against the unions and in favor of the suppression of the law engraved upon the Twelve Tables which permitted free organization; and the fierce hatred of the patrician minority of the Roman people, who were assuming and monopolizing the public lands contrary to the Licinian law—a dead letter—had by no means died out.¹⁷ The fact is, that although this great social feud had not cropped out in the time of the appearance of Spartacus so as to be much mentioned in any record of the time, yet

¹⁴ See account of this suppression together with the efforts of Clodius and Cicero for and against it, in chapter xiii. Trade Unions.

¹⁵ Mommsen, De Collegiis et Sodalitatibus Romanorum, p. 73. De legibus contra collega latas. "Usque ad finem sæculi septimi liberum jus coeundi mansit." The year Ab Urbe Condita 700. Sæculum septimum, was B. C. 58.

¹⁶ Mommsen says that Asconius refers to the year 65 before Christ in the following words: "Frequenter tum etiam cœtus factiosorum hominum sine publica auctoritate malo publico fiebant propter quod postea collegia pluribus legibus sublata sunt," Of course these "societies of pretentious men without authority" to which Asconius refers, are the trade and other labor unions. (Ascon., In Cornel. p. 75.)

¹⁷ Centralization of wealth upon individuals was at this time about at its highest pitch. Formerly even the lords sometimes worked on these farms. Pliny can hardly believe it, though he enumerates many, Nat. Hist. XVIII, 3. Plutarch, Solon, also speaks of it. But working with one's own hands in Agriculture had disappeared by the time of Spartacus and everything was now done by slaves and freedmen. See Wallace, Number of Mankind, p. 123, referring to Plutarch, Solon. Solon finding that the very poorest freedmen who, if they did not get work, were seized and sold, took their part and must therefore be classed among the earliest labor reformers on record. Not only Spartacus but great numbers at his time and before were seized and sold into slavery. See Encyclopædia Britannica, Vol. XXI, p. 653, 9th edition. Agathocles tyrant of Syracuse after murdering 10,000 of the people of Segesta had sold the rest into slavery. B. C. 307. Schaubach, S. 1-2, Zahl der Sklaven.

it was there, ready to be kindled into flame at any moment and by any daring adventurer.

The most terrible enemy of the plebeians, or, as we prefer to call them, the working classes, was Cicero,¹⁸ whose sense of justice was confined to his own interpretation of laws favoring the privileged class, or gens families. Strange to say, in the year 70 B. C., he was in the act of prosecuting Verres, the prætor of Sicily, for acts of rapacity which it was feared would again cause the servile war to flame forth in that island; a subject concerning which we shall soon have more to say; but a short time afterwards we find him violently lampooning the workingman at Rome in his defense of the laws restricting their organization. We also find him slurring Clodius, whose powerful eloquence succeeded in vindicating them for a time and in bringing odium upon his name. Studying the causes of the servile war of this period from a consultation of the changes which occurred in the Roman law, and bearing, at the same time, a close scrutiny of the chronicled events such as are sparingly afforded by historians, together with such as we find engraved on the tablets of the unions before and after the promulgation of the restrictions to labor organizations, we cannot but see that the wide-spread disaffection called the servile war of Spartacus¹⁹ must have been largely caused by the law prohibiting and threatening to prohibit free right of combination.

Though little is known of the birth of Spartacus, the legend goes that his father whom he much loved was also a captive slave; and that the young son of 15 years, as he held the head of his dying parent, chained and nailed to the trunk of a tree, is conjured by the old man to avenge his death²⁰ and that, like Hannibal, he then and there vowed vengeance upon his powerful enemies,²¹ and in consequence his terrible spring at Rome in riper years was in obedience to promise. All this must, for want of proof, be re-

¹⁸ As evidence that Cicero hated the plebeians we have in many places, quoted his own words in our copious annotations, q. v. in chapters on Trade Unions.

¹⁹ Florus, III, 20, init, ennobles it with the appellation, "Bellum Spartacium."

²⁰ Vela, the Italian sculptor executed a group of statues portraying this scene which was set up in London in 1862. Dictionnaire Universel, Art. Spartacus.

²¹ "Serment de Spartacus; groupe de marbre de M. Barrias, Solon de 1872. Spartacus aîné enchaîné et cloué à un tronc d'arbre vient d'expirer etc." See Dictionnaire Universel, Art. Spartacus.

garded as romance. But we come to the recital of more solid facts.

Spartacus, in the year B. C. 74, was a man of giant frame, handsome, of white complexion with an abundance of dark ringlets, and possessed of an affable bearing, winning and yet severe in its magnetic aptitude for command. He was young for one of his experience, knowledge and judgment of the world. He had been a shepherd on his native plains in Thracian Greece.²³ While engaged at this bucolic calling he made companionship with other young men unfitted for this dreamy life. They attached themselves to habits of the numerous mountaineers who sallied from their cabins at convenient times and attacked Roman soldiers who often marched through the country during those days of war and invasion. At any rate, we first find him at Capua, a city situated about twenty miles north from Naples. We also have evidence²⁴ that he had been captured in Thrace, taken forcibly to Capua as a prisoner and on account of his powerful physique and peculiarly fine appearance, was trained in a school of gladiators by the master teacher of athletic games, Lentulus Batiatus. Capua was then a considerable city of Italy. It was celebrated for its extravagance and luxury. In the heart of an exceedingly fertile region, its indolent patrician inhabitants had usurped the ager publicus which during the happier days of the golden age of Rome had been farmed by labor unions or colleges under the celebrated provisions of Numa Pompilius and Solon.²⁵ The ager publicus was the public land. It was property in common which belonged to the State.²⁶ The Licinian Law, or the memory of the defunct statute having this title, was at that moment a bone of contention. Spurius Cassius long before the Twelve Tables were engraved or the decemvirate created, had made a strong effort in behalf of the unions, or order of the united la-

²³ See International Encyclopædia; La Rousse, Dictionnaire Universel, Articles, "Spartacus;" Schambach, Italische Sklavenaufstand, V. 15. "Dass Spartacus von Geburt ein Thraker gewesen, darin stimmen alle Nachrichten überein." Consult also Florus, III, 20; Appian, I. 116-121. Orosius, Historiarum Adversus Paganos, VII.

²⁴ Plutarch, Crassus, 8.

²⁵ Digest, lib. xlvii, tit. 22, leg. 4, and the law of the Twelve Tables there spoken of by Plut., Numa, xviii.

²⁶ See Licinian law and the Agrarian conflicts, Plut., Titus Gracchus. Also the Encyclopædias, Art. Agrarian Law.

borers, one of the great branches of that labor organization indirectly provided for by Numa. The co-operators or amalgamated societies for victualing the inhabitants of Rome were necessary to the life of the state.* Their business had been to attend to the farming of the ager publicus or lands belonging to the state. It is an unhappy characteristic of individual wealth, however, to love the boasted social gulf separating them from labor; and as certain individuals grew enormously rich and politically powerful they committed encroachments upon the ancient system of supplying the people with provisions as it were, by communistic means. The trade unionists or socialists were gradually encroached upon by these wealthy gentes, or patricians who pushed slaves out upon the ager publicus, driving off the unionists and their system by slow degrees, substituting for them abject and degraded toil, and maddening the collegia or unions who took advantage of their organizations to discuss this grievance, a political as well as a social one." There were at Rome good men as well as bad among the rulers in power. At all times these are to be seen in Roman history. Spurius Cassius, a consul, got a law passed restoring these lands, which had been arbitrarily taken possession of, because he found that the wrong had already begun, in his early time to produce poverty. But the patricians arrogantly ignored the measure, or rather fought it down. Great estates manned by slaves appeared on the public domain to which the optimates had no right whatever, except that of superior force, prestige and tact. Thus, on the one hand, in many places, especially in the particular territory south

* See "Victualers," in chap. xvi, pp. 399-400. Also consult Granier, Histoire des Classes Ouvrières, chap. xli, explaining how the trade unions were employed by the Roman government.

"In addition to our own copious figures on the importation of slave—in other words cheap labor, we quote Schambach as follows: "Von diesen ruckweisen Ueberschwemmung mit frischen Menschenkräften abgesehen, wurde der regelmässige Bedarf auf dem Wege des Handels gedeckt. Fort und fort wurden aus dem Norden, aus den Gegenden am schwarzen Meere, aus Syrien und Libyen eine Menge von Sklaven durch Händler nach Italien importirt. Lange Zeit war Delos der Hauptsitz dieses Handels; zur Zeit der höchsten Blüte (um 100 v. Chr.) sollen an einem Tage oft 10,000 Sklaven hier abgesetzt sein. Selbstverständlich war auch Rom ein wichtiger Platz für den Sklavenhandel. Auf welche Weise der Händler in dem besitz seiner Waare gekommen, darnach fragte man nicht; Menschenraub zu Wasser und zu Lande, selbst Menschenjagen, wie sie heutzutage noch in Afrika an der Tagesordnung sind, waren nichts Ungewöhnliches, wenn auch die grosse Masse gebrachten, als ein Opfer heimlicher Fehden, durch Tausch oder Kau. in dem Besitz ihrer derzeitigen Herren gekommen sein mochten." Der Italische Sklavenaufstand, S. 2.

and east of Rome, of which Capua was a fruitful center, the ancient collegia or labor organizations were gradually driven together into cities, and the slaves of conquest and slaves of birth from the gens who were everywhere numerous, were forced²⁰ to delve for rapacious masters, without remuneration, under the tyrannical lash of foreign mercenary drivers.²¹

The same state of things continued until the time of Appius Claudius, one of the Roman decemvirs, whose business as a decemvir was, per se to carry out the law of Cassius, restoring the public domain to the people. What was this decemvirate created for? History is exceedingly explicit and unanimous in stating the functions of the decemvirate—decemviri legibus scribendis.²² They were created for the express purpose of carrying out the law of the Twelve Tables, one special provision in which was to encourage the organization of the free labor element; which organization, as a business compact, was to till the ager publicus on shares and furnish the people food and other necessities therefrom.

Appius Claudius must, especially from a standpoint of sociology, ever be regarded as one of those black and morally nauseating buzzards at which an occasional glimpse is had by the disgusted sensibilities of the virtuous as they climb down the ladder of time. He was, in a most strangely surreptitious manner, the arch enemy of the very measure he has elected to defend! In war, his best soldiers the mercenarii, forsook him. In morals, he was a cruel and villainous libertine and his rape of Virginia,²³ under pretense that she was one of the "miserable proletaries" who bore the taint of labor and that therefore, the laws of chivalry and of common decency did not reach her case, together with the terrible death of the poor girl at her father's hand, ended in bringing the tryant to prison and a violent end.²⁴

²⁰ Consult Strabo, VI. p. 250, see also Lüders' Dionysische Künstler: "Der von den Tarentinern gegen die Römer zu Hülfe gerufene Pyrrhus hatte, um den verweichlichten Bürgern anzuhelfen, nichts Eiligeres zu thun als die Sysaiten in zukunft zu verbieten, (page 12). Also Schambach's Italischer Sklavenaufstand, VI, S. 17.

²¹ For accounts of the enormous slave populations of different eras, see Schambach, Italischer Sklavenaufstand, I, 1-4. Bücher, Aufstände der Unfreien Arbeiter, S. 26, 36, 65, 84. Drumann, Arbeiter und Communisten, S. 24, 156, 64 and our own chapters.

²² Livy, III, 33.

²³ Livy, III, 55, 56, 57. Dionys. of Harlicarn.

²⁴ Livy, Libri Historiarum, III, 57. "Et illi carcerem sedificatum esse, quod

The inimical inroads upon the ager publicus, and the consequent ruin of the common people instigated by Appius Claudius and his band of patrician adherents created so great a defection among the plebeians that in B. C. 366, the famous Licinian law, de modo agri was called into being by Stolo a low-born himself. It was, in reality, a regulation instituting a system of small holdings; for under it one of the consuls was to be a man of the people and no one rich or poor could be allowed more than 500 acres of the public land. This celebrated law, of Licinius Stolo, a plebeian, which may be regarded as one of the primitive causes of those great social wars and agrarian contentions such as brought Rome to her phenomenal decline, was also doomed to defeat. By the time of the revolt of Spartacus we find, on every side of the metropolis, the grandees occupying the land, living in luxury, while the land which for many centuries had been cultivated by the comparatively free laborers or freedmen, was now laboriously worked by degraded slaves, ready to revolt and watching their opportunities for revenge.

We are now prepared to resume the thread of our narrative. Young Spartacus, a workingman, in every sense,²³ by birth from an earth-born family, by accident of capture and by sale as a slave, was assigned to the exciting and dangerous labors of a gladiator. His task was the revolting one of amusing the non-laboring grandees, their ladies and fashionable pets, the indolent and proud, who languidly sought in the game, the wager, the bagnio, the amphitheatre and its bloody combats, a gratification of their passion for these scenes of ancient life. The ruins of the great marble-faced amphitheatre of Capua where Spartacus is supposed to have killed many of his own comrades in misfortune, are still an object of attraction to travelers.²⁴ Capua was at that time a large city. It lay on the Volturnus, a beautiful river of Campania flowing from the Samnian Appenines westward into the Mediterranean lomicilium plebis Romanæ vocare sit solitus. Proinde, ut ille iterum ac saepius provocet, sic se iterum ac saepius indicem illi ferre, ni vindicias ab libertate in servitutem dederit: si ad indicem non eat, pro damnato in vincula duci iubere. Ut haud quoquam improbante sic magno motu animorum, quum tanti viri supplicio suamet plebi iam nimia libertas videretur, in carcerem est coniectus."

²³ Dr. Schambach's effort to prove him to have had a recognized family, is without foundation in fact.

²⁴ See Rinaldo, Memoria Istoriche Della Città di Capua.

through mountain gorges, valleys and plains, watering some of the most fruitful lands of that magnificent peninsula. These delightful and fruitful fields had been the ager publicus since 363 years before Christ; but like many of the vast estates of the republic, had by the time of our hero, become private manorial grounds tilled by slaves.

Spartacus had previously had some military experience of a low order;³⁵ for it is certain that he was a prisoner, having deserted the alliance in which he was treated as a servant—a humiliation his spirit was too proud to bear—and being recaptured, was sold into slavery.

There was at Capua, in addition to the amphitheatre, a school, probably of importance enough to secure for its enterprising proprietor, Lentulus Batiatus, a considerable income. Plutarch expressly states that most of the gladiators were Thracian Gauls, and further exonerates Spartacus from having come to this fate, by any crimes he had committed.³⁶ He was forced there by the injustice of his master. It seems to have been the opinion of Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton, that Roman gladiators were superior to the Gaul or other imported contestants at the Pompeian, and of course, the Capuan amphitheatres; and we are to infer from him that Roman vigor and strength were superior to all other even at the metropolis of Rome. But we must ever bear in mind that this Roman blood was native; that although it was servile by heredity through long generations from plebeian parentage as the element of outcasts, yet it was actually Roman blood; while the Thracian element was actually of Greek blood, and that in consequence a gladiatorial fight between a Thracian Greek and a Roman stirred up the Roman spirit of emulation on grounds of national pride; since they fancied they beheld in the bloody duel a recapitulation of the more serious conflicts with Pyrrhus or Mithridates. We know that on occasions of the games at the amphitheatres, when Romans were to meet Gauls or Greeks, the advertisements were more pronounced and the betting ran ruinously high among the rich frequenters of the ring. Undoubtedly Spartacus, who spoke Greek and Latin with facility, was aware of this. He had, as a scholar under Lentulus Batiatus, either in the open functions or at rehearsals, severely punished, by his giant muscular force and mastership of the art of swordsmanship and pugilism, many wretches whose lot like his own was to measure strength and science alike with friend and foe.

³⁵ "Il avait servi dans les légions comme auxiliaire, mais trop fier pour accepter une servitude déguisée sous le nom d'alliance, il avait déserté à la tête d'une troupe de ses compatriotes, mais repris et vendu son courage et sa force étaient employés en qualité de gladiateur." La Rousse, Dictionnaire Universel.

³⁶ Plutarch, Marcus Crassus, 8: "Δέντυλου τινὸς Βατιάτου μονομάχους ἐν Καπύῃ τρέφοντος, ὃν οἱ πολλοὶ Γαλάται καὶ Θράκες ἦσαν." Florus Annales, III. 20: "quippe cum servi militaverint, gladiatores imperaverint, illi infimæ sortis homines, hi pessimæ, auxere ludibrio calamitatem." So also Schambach, Italische Sklavenaufstand, VI, S. 18-19, who puts the proportion one-third Thracians and two-thirds Gauls in the armies of Spartacus: "Zum Oberanführer wählten sie jetzt den Thraker Spartacus, zu Unteranführern die beiden Gallier Crixus und Cnomaus. Mit grosser Wahrscheinlichkeit dürfen wir aus diesen Wahlen in Bezug auf die Zusammensetzung des Haufens den Schluss ziehen, das etwa ein-drittel Thraker zwei-drittel Galliern gegenüberstanden, ein Verhältnis, welches sich auch in weiteren Verlauf der Ereignisse nicht wesentlich ändert."

But although of prodigious courage, aptness and physical energy, Spartacus was humane and generous; and his nature revolted against the hideous character of his employment. He loved the memory of his native hills and valleys. His central desire was to reach home and spend in quiet the remainder of his eventful life. Besides, his wife, also a Thracian Greek, was ever at his side with her loving tones of encouragement. Plutarch says that she was possessed of the gift of divination. He relates that Spartacus when taken prisoner was first brought to Rome to be sold. While there, a serpent was once, as he slumbered, discovered twinning caressingly about his head and locks; whereupon on inquiry by superstitious people, as to the import of this strange action of the gods, she answered in her public capacity as retainer to the orgies of Bacchus, that this conduct of the friendly reptile betokened that her husband would rise to be great and formidable, and die happy! ³⁷ Unfortunately for the Romans he rose to be formidable to say the least.

³⁷ Plutarch, Marcus Crassus, 8; "It is said when he was first brought to Rome to be sold, a serpent was seen twisted about his face as he slept. His wife, who was of the same tribe, having the gift of divination, and being a retainer besides to the orgies of Bacchus, said, it was a sign that he would rise to something very great and formidable, the result of which would be happy. This woman still lived with him, and was the companion of his flight." According to Tacitus, however, she was a German; for in his Germania, a curious chapter occurs in her praise, setting her forth as an example of the heroism of the ancient German women. See infra, p. 303 note 73. We quote the excellent statement of Schambach on this point; Italische Sklavenaufstand, V, S. 16: "Was des Spartacus frühere Lebensschicksale anlangt, so steht fest, dass er eine Zeit lang unter den Hilfstruppen im römischen Solde gestanden hat, vielleicht in dem Heere des Proconsul P. Claudius, der die noch freien Stämme der makedonischen Thraker unterwerfen sollte. Hier hat er sich wahrscheinlich jene genaue Kenntniss des römischen Herrwesens erworben, welche die unerlässliche Vorbedingung zu

But whatever the vicissitudes of Spartacus at Rome, it is certainly at Capua, many miles from the eternal city, that we must introduce him. He must have been sent to the Capuan school of gladiators to be trained in the science of those ferocious combats with an object of being sent back to Rome prepared ad gladium or ad ludum,³⁸ for the amphitheatre which afterwards, at the Coliseum became the scenes of brutalities and abominations, such as the world has seldom witnessed. Neither are we prepared to state whether Batiatus the lanista or "butcher-master" of Capua, was to prepare him for the full-armor games of the hoplomachi or for the deadly Thracian dagger duels "to promote the pleasure of gentlemen."³⁹ But for whatever exact purpose he was designed at the arena they were doomed to disappointment.

At Capua there was at that moment an organization of the *unguentarii*⁴⁰ who furnished, it is said, all Italy with perfumes of the richest quality and who in carrying on this trade under the rules of their collegium or labor union realized, so long as the ancient law applied in their case, a good living as wage earners. Considering the amount seinen zukünftigen Siegen war. Nach Florus ist er sodann desertirt u. Strassenräuber geworden, als solcher gefangen und unter die Gladiatoren verurtheilt. Mit dieser Ueberlieferung stimmte indessen Appian I, 116, ἐκ δὲ αἰχμαλωσίας καὶ πράξεως ἐν τοῖς μονομάχοις ὡς nicht überein, und auch ein Fragment Varro's bei Charis. I, p. 108, Innocente Varro de rebus urbanis tertio, Spartaco innocente coniecto ad gladium spricht gegen Florus. Dass er mehrmals seinen Herrn gewechselt, ehe er in des Cn. Lentulus Batiatus Fechterschule nach Capua kam, scheint aus Plut. Crass. 8; ὅτε πρῶτον εἰς Πώμην ὄντιος ἤχθη hervorzugehen. Plutarch erzählt auch noch die Sage, dass nach seiner Ankunft in Rom sich eine seinen künftigen Siegen war. Nach Florus ist er sodann desertirt und Strassenschlange im Schafe um sein Haupt gewunden und dass eine thrakische Wahrsagerin dies dahin gedeutet habe, 'er werde gross und furchtbar und bis an sein unglückliches Ende glücklich sein,' eine Prophezeiung, die in ihrem letzten Theile an Allgemeinheit nichts zu wünschen übrig lässt.

³⁸ To be killed by decree of law, or to be saved after three years of service, in successful competitive fights. Very few ad ludum gladiators, ever came out alive.

³⁹ Florus, Annales, III, 20, §8; "Nec abnuit, ille de stipendario Thracæ miles, de milite desertor; inde latro, dein in honore virorum gladiator."

⁴⁰ Unguentarii; see chapter xix, on Trade Unions, Capua is also the seat of the curious historical inscription of Aquillius, (Orelli, Inscriptionum Latinarum Collectio, No. 3, 308), which speaks of the 917 runaway slaves restored by him to their masters, during the great Sicilian Slave war (chap. xi., Athenion), which could not have been inscribed more than about 17 years before. We therefore quote the inscription entire as it furnishes evidence of what must have been the state of feeling with working people at the time the war with Spartacus broke out at Capua: "M Aquillius, M. F. Gaius. procos viam feci ab regio ad Capuam et in ea via Ponteis omneis meiliarios tabellariosque poseui hinc sunt Nouceriam meilia Captuam XXCIII, Muranum IXXIII cosentiam CXXIII Valentiam CLXXX. ad Fretum ad statum CCXXXI regium CCXXXVII, suma Af Capua regium meilia CCCXXI. Et eidem praetor in Sicilia fugiteivos. Italicorum conquesine redeique homines DCCCCXVII eidemque primus feci. Ut de agro publico aratoribus cederent paastores forum aedisque publicas heic feci."

of demand for such an article in the most extravagant and luxurious era of Roman wealth, we must infer that the business employed a large number of people. But just at this moment the senate at Rome was seriously contemplating the suppression of the trade unions. We know that this contemplated suppression was desperately resisted both by the unions and some of the tribunes of the people and other men of power; and if we are to suppose that the men were as keenly on the alert in those days as they now are, we cannot but imagine that their influence if not their numbers, were lent toward kindling this servile war. For this reason if for no other, it is highly important that we should know this story.

The auspices were all favorable to Spartacus while at Capua, who, together with 200 of the Thracian, Gallic and Roman gladiators, plotted a measure for escape. The plan was to stealthily secure the knives and other articles to be found in the kitchens and eating rooms of the institution, and with these, make a rush in a body for the principal doorway which was guarded by Roman soldiers.⁴¹ Just before the appointed moment arrived, however, a certain person enrolled in the conspiracy let his courage forsake him; or it may be, was bribed by secret detectives to reveal the truth. However this may have been, a dash by the officers of the law was suddenly made for the arrest of the insurrectionists, which would have succeeded had not Spartacus put his utmost efforts forth to prevent it—being actually ahead of time. As it was, 78 of the most trustworthy and daring burst through the door into the street and thence out of town. The 78 men⁴² had succeeded in providing themselves with long knives and any other things they could lay hands on which could be used as weapons."⁴³

⁴¹ Appian. Historia Romana, I. 116: "Τοῦ δ' αὐτοῦ χρόνου περὶ τὴν Ἰταλίαν μονομάχων ἐς θείας ἐν Καπύῃ τρεφομένων, Σπάρτακος Θράξ ἀνὴρ, ἐστρατευμένος ποτὲ Ῥωμαίοις, ἐκ δὲ αἰχμαλωσίας καὶ πράσεως ἐν τοῖς μονομάχοις ὢν, ἐπεισεν αὐτῶν ἐς ἑβδομήκοντα ἀνδρας μάλιστα κινδυνεῦσαι περὶ ῥλευθερίας μᾶλλον ἢ θείας ἐπιδείξεως, καὶ βιασάμενος, σὺν αὐτοῖς τοὺς φυλάσσοντας ἐξέδραμε, καὶ τινῶν ὁδοιπόρων ξύλοις καὶ ξιφιδίοις ὀπλισάμενος ἐς τὸ Βέσβιον ὄρος ἀνέφυγεν." Plutarch, Crassus, 8, (Langhorne,) says, "One Lentulus Batiatus kept at Capua a number of gladiators, the greatest part of which were Gauls and Thracians; men not reduced to that employment for any crimes they had committed, but forced upon it by their master. Two hundred of them, therefore, agreed to make their escape. Though the plot was discovered, threescore and eighteen of them, by their extreme vigilance, were beforehand with their master, and sallied out of town, having first seized all the long knives and spits in a cook's shop."

⁴² Florus, Annales, III. 20, puts it at 30: "Cum triginta hand amplius ejusdem fortunæ viris, erumperunt Capua." Plutarch says 78; and this best agrees with others.

The first battle was fought with the troops of the garrison at Capua, and if we are to credit the hints of Plutarch the conflict must be considered both the opening battle and victory of Spartacus. The Capuan troops, after the escape of the seventy-four, attacked them, as they gained the gates and passages into the open road; but by some dexterous charge were defeated by the gladiators and compelled to return empty-handed to the garrison. They took the main road, presumably the Appian Way, which, leading from Rome through the city of Capua, joins the Via Aquilia about five miles to the south of this place. The Via Aquilia, parting from the Appian Way to the right, leads almost directly to the foot of Mount Vesuvius, a distance from Capua of nineteen or twenty miles. It was on this march that the fugitives met some wagons loaded with a quantity of daggers, swords and knives which they were taking to the city. These weapons were to be used by gladiators in the arena; and it is not unlikely that they were intended for these fugitives' own use at the Capuan amphitheatre. Implements so much needed were, of course, instantly seized, though not without a fight. Thus equipped they reached a mountain ledge in safety. On personal inspection of the place we are inclined to conjecture that Spartacus and his friends first reached the northeasterly base of Vesuvius, or that part which is now the fragment of the volcano⁴⁴ and known as the "Somma," whose separate peak five miles eastward from the crater is called the "Punta del Nasone" and is nearly 4,000 feet above the sea which is visible to the westward. At that time, before the eruption, it must have been 5,000 or 6,000 feet high.

⁴³ Plutarch, Marcus Crassus, 9, in relating these things speaks very bitterly against them, as being mere barbarians: "Καὶ πρῶτον μὲν τοὺς ἐκ Καπύης ἐλθόντας ὡσάμενοι, καὶ πολλῶν ὀπλῶν ἐπιλαβόμενοι πολεμιστηρίων, ἄσμενοι ταῦτα μεταλάβανον, ἀπορρίψαντες, ὡς ἄτιμα καὶ βάρβαρα, τὰ τῶν μονομάχων." Florus and Cicero put the number of the first gladiators down as low as possible: "Cum Spartaco minus multi prima fuerunt. Quid tandem isti mali in tam tenera insula non fecissent?" Cicero, Ad Atticum, Liber VI. Epistola, 2. Florus, Annales, III. 20, §. 1, declares there were scarcely more than 30 who escaped with Spartacus: "Spartacus, Crixus, Ænomaus, effracto Lentuli ludo, cum triginta haud amplius ejusdem fortunæ viris eruperunt Capua." Consult also Frontin, LXXIV. 1, 5, 21; Vellejus Paterculus, II, 30, 6.

⁴⁴ Vesuvius was not known to have ever had an eruption at that time. Appian, Historia Romana, I. 116, only says: "ἐν τῷ Βέσβιον ὅπως ἀνέφυγεν." Plutarch

Here the fugitives took refuge among the crags and wild vines that overhung the mountain side. It was at a point where there was but one approach, that they fixed their first resting place. This was a projecting table-rock which shelved forward over a craggy precipice embowered in the foliage of wild grape vines.⁴⁶ Here, on a crag rising perpendicularly over an immense chasm, the little band pitched their tents. They held a council of war and elected Spartacus commander-in-chief and Crixus and Oenomaus,⁴⁷ his lieutenants. Spartacus, now in full command, immediately began to exercise those gifts of genius, foresight and power which have covered one of the most brilliant military pages in the history of either ancient or modern times.⁴⁸

As might be expected, the people of Capua were filled with terror at the escape of the gladiators.⁴⁹ There was a feeling of shame and humiliation based upon the fact that the rebels were slaves. To combat with equals had ever been the pride of Rome; but to bring her noble arms to bear against a thing so low and hateful in the scale of being as a servile revolt was, from a social point of view, a national degradation and a disgrace.

Nevertheless, the report reached Rome that the gladiators under Spartacus, the prophetic giant, had revolted and escaped to the mountains, and a large detachment of troops, who were probably stationed at Capua, was sent who must have borrowed from Sallust (See Schambach, S. 9), is our principal source for these details.

⁴⁶ La Rousse, Dictionnaire Universel, Art. Spartacus, see also Plutarch, Marcus Crassus, VIII., IX.

⁴⁷ Flor., III, 20, §. 1. "Spartacus, Crixus, Oenomaus, effracto Lentuli iudicio, cum triginta haud amplius ejusdem fortunæ viris."

⁴⁸ Schambach, Der Italische Sklavenaufstand, V. S. 15: "Plutarch sagt im Leben des Crassus cap. 8: οἱ πολλοὶ Σπαρτάκειον πόλεμον ὀνομάζουσι und Florus, der die sicilischen Sklavenkriege 'bellum servile' nennt, setzt über das neueste Capital des dritten Buches die Ueberschrift 'bellum Spartacum,' bringt den italischen Sklavenkrieg also in eine Kategorie mit den andern grossen Kriegen (wie dem bellum Hannibalicum, Sertorianum Mithridaticum), in denen ein Mann so vorwiegend als die Seele des Kampfes erscheint, dass dieser nach ihm benannt zu werden verdient. Zwar finden wir bei den römischen Autoren vorwiegend andere Bezeichnungen, z. B. bellum servile (Augustin de c. d. III, 26, Ampel c. 41, 45), servilis tumultus (Caes. b. G. I, 40), bellum fugitivorum (Front), 'hoc fugitivorum et ut verius dicam gladiatorum bellum' (Oros.); aber allen diesen Benennungen liegt die Absicht zu Grunde, den verhassten Führer der Aufständischen nicht wider Willen zu Nachruhm zu verhelfen."

⁴⁹ In further proof that originally the paterfamilias had the right to enslave or even kill his children, see Canon Lightfoot, on The Colossians, p. 312, quoting the Digest, i. 6. "In potestate sunt servi dominorum: quæ quidem potestas juris gentium est: nam apud omnes peræque gentes animadvertere possumus dominis in servos vitæ necisque potestatem fuisse."

out under the command of the Roman prætor, Clodius Glaber, to subdue them.⁴⁹ One account gives the number of this force at just 3,000 men. Clodius appeared at the base of the precipice during the day, knowing that the rebels were on the height above him. The army, however, took up its quarters at one side of the acclivity to the ascent of which there was but one approach. This they guarded to prevent the gladiators from escape in the night.

Now was the time for the wily Spartacus, whose band was without suitable arms for a contest. The duel was to consist in the measure of comparative wit. When evening came Spartacus and his men who during the day had taken vines and of them woven ladders sufficiently strong to hold the heaviest man and long enough to reach the foot of the overhanging precipice back of whose capstone the band lay intrenched, let themselves down in such silence as not to awaken the suspicion of the slumbering army. All descended the ladder empty-handed in this manner, except one man who remained to lower the arms; after which he also climbed down and thus all succeeded uninjured, in reaching the plain below, at a point least suspected by the Romans.⁵⁰ Profound silence reigned. The proud prætor and his 3,000 men were now but a few steps from where stood those desperate slaves who well knew that one slip or false action might end their lives.

Spartacus, ranged his men in a manner to surround the Roman encampment. When all was ready the startling whoop of onset was given and the gladiators centering in, apparently in large numbers, with their terrifying war-cry and death-dealing weapons, completely routed those whom they did not kill upon the spot. The rout of the Romans was complete and the rebels remained masters of their baggage and arms, 74 Roman cohorts being killed on the spot.⁵¹

⁴⁹ Compare Florus, III. 20, 4. "Clodio Glabro, per fauces montis vitigineas." See Schambach, Italischer Sklavenaufstand, VI. S. 19. Also International Encyc. Art. Spartacus, Livy, Epitome, XCV., gives the name of the Roman legate as Claudius Pulcher." Appian says Varinius Glabrus, I. 116. . . . "καὶ πρῶτος ἐπ' αὐτὸν ἐκπεμφθεὶς Ὀυαρίνιος Γλάσπος." But he gives us very little of this first strategical manœuvre and battle, and passes on to the greater conflicts which followed.

⁵⁰ Plutarch, Marcus Crassus, 8; Frontinus, I. 5, 22.

⁵¹ Frontinus, I. 5, 21. "Cohortes gladiatoribus quatuor et Septuaginta ces-

The result of this second success was electrifying. On the part of the Romans, public sentiment was filled with humiliation and disgust. Arrangements were immediately made at Rome to send a powerful force, under a leader in whom they had confidence; and Publius Varinius, a prætor, was sent south at the command of a large body of troops ably supported by two lieutenants, Furius and Cossinius. The prætor had so much faith in Cossinius that he made him his assistant and chief counselor.

Spartacus, who had gained this decisive victory at the precipice of Vesuvius, was cool and calm, full of the sense of his responsibility and still unwavering in the child-like desire to reach safely his native home, far to the northward, across the Adriatic. He had the ripe judgment to foreknow that the Romans when aroused were invincible.

But resolutely suiting the opportunity to the circumstances, he issued a proclamation of emancipation and protection to all the slaves who should join his force. Multitudes of cattle-drivers, shepherds, herdsmen and others whose condition had been degraded by the land-holders to slavery, appeared before him offering their allegiance. They were accepted and armed with implements wrested from Clodius, at the ambushade of Vesuvius. The entire force under Clodius Glaber, being only given at 3,000 there could not have been arms enough for more than that number, unless some of the volunteers furnished their own weapons. This might have been the case; but to offset the argument that the servile auxiliaries used other than the dignified military armor, we have a passage in Plutarch, declaring that at the first skirmish against a detachment from Capua where the gladiators were victorious they threw away their knives as things "disgraceful, dishonorable and barbarous."

His wish was constantly to secure arms, and naturally; for immediately on the defeat of Clodius Glaber, the renegade force of 78 gladiators from Capua swelled into an serint;" See also Flor., III. 20: "Nihil tale opinantis ducis, subito impetu castra rapuere." Schambach, Italischer Sklavenkrieg, S. 20, says: "Alle Nachrichten stimmen nemlich darin überein, dass die Fechter an Zahl unendlich viel geringer waren, Frontin I, 5, 21 gibt sogar an, es seien noch die 74 allein gewesen: verum etiam ex alio latere Clodium ita terruit, ut aliquot cohortes gladiatoribus quatuor et septuaginta cesserint. Der Angriff gelang vollständig, die römischen 'milites tumultuarii' räumten fliehend das Feld und liessen ihr Lager mit allem Gepäck im Stich, das eine Beute der Empörer wurde."

army of 10,000 "men of great vigor and very swift runners." and Spartacus "covered them with armor, some heavy, some light for picket duty."⁵² As the cities of Herculaneum and Pompeii were but a few miles distant to the south and west, it is quite possible that he realized not only arms but many volunteers from that quarter. The indomitable rebel now set himself about drilling his men into military service. The wretched ergastuli were changed into free men who assumed military dignity,⁵³ from the moment of their desertion from their masters thus realizing immediate participation, without having to linger upon the anticipations of promise. With 10,000 desperate soldiers under rigid drill he soon felt himself capable to cope with a prætorian army. Nor had he long to wait.

The Roman prætor, Publius Varinius, as already stated, was in the same year, B. C. 74, sent with a large army to put an end to the trouble.⁵⁴ He had two lieutenants, Furius and Cossinius. Varinius placed much confidence in Cossinius as a man of uncommon judgment. But the combined wisdom of both was not enough to induce the Roman army to keep together; for Furius was sent with a strong detachment of 2,000 men against the "common robber."⁵⁵ Spartacus, perceiving the Roman army divided into two columns, fell upon the weakest line, that of Fu-

⁵² Plutarch, Marcus Crassus; Florus, III. 20, 3, also speaks of the 10,000 as follows: "Servisque ad vexillum vocatis, cum statim decem amplius millia cois-sent hominum." Plutarch, Marcus Crassus, correctly applies this estimate after rather than before the battle of the ambushade.

⁵³ Smith's Dictionary of Greek and Roman Antiquities, Art. Spartacus, The runaways resorted to all sorts of expedients to obtain arms and munitions. See Florus, III. 20, 6. "Affluentibus in diem copiis, quum jam esset justus exercitus e viminibus pecudumque tegumentis, inconditos sibi clipeos; e ferro ergastulorum recocto gladios ac tela fecerunt." So also Appian, De Bellis Civilibus, I. 116-117: "Μετὰ δὲ τοῦτο Σπαρτάκῳ μὲν ἐπὶ μᾶλλον πολλοὶ συνέθεον, καὶ ἐπὶ τὰ μυριάδες ἦσαν ἡδὴ στρατοῦ, καὶ ὅπλα ἐχάλκευε, καὶ παρασκευὴν συνέλεγε, οἱ δ' ἐν ἄστει τοὺς ὑπάτους ἐξέπεμπον μετὰ δύο τελεῶν."

⁵⁴ Appian, De Bellis Civilibus, I. 116. "Μερίζομεν δ' αὐτῷ τὰ κέρδη κατ' ἰσομοιρίαν ταχὺ πλῆθος ἦν ἀνδρῶν, καὶ πρῶτος ἐπ' αὐτὸν ἐκπεμφθεὶς Ὀυαρίνιος Γλάβρος, ἐπὶ δ' ἐκείνῳ Πόπλιος Ὀυαλέριος, οὐ πολιτικὴν στρατιάν ἄγοντες ἀλλ' ὅσους ἐν σπουδῇ καὶ παρόδῳ συνέλεξαν (οὐ γάρ πω Ῥωμαῖοι πόλεμον, ἀλλ' ἐπιδρομὴν τινα καὶ ληστηρίῳ τὸ ἔργον ὁμοιον ἡγοῦντο εἶναι), συμβαλόντες ἠττῶντο. Ὀυαρινίου δὲ καὶ τὸν ἱππὸν αὐτὸς Σπάρτακος περὶσπασε παρὰ τὸσοῦτον ἦλθε κινδύνου Ῥωμαίων ὁ στρατηγὸς αὐτὸς αἰχμάλωτος ὑπὸ μονομάχου γενέσθαι."

⁵⁵ Horace, Carmena, liber, III. Carmen. 14, lines 18-20;

"Et eadem Marsi memorem duelli,
Spartacum si qua potuit vagantem
Fallere testa."

Cornelius Tacitus, Annales, lib. III. cap. 73, speaks of the successes of Spartacus as shameful applying the epithets "robber and deserter." "Non alias magis sua populique Romani contumelia indoluisse Caesarem ferunt, quam quod desertor et praedo hostium more ageret, ne Spartaco quidem post tot consularium exercituum clades inultam Italiam urenti."

rius, and with an impetuous dash, broke through his main body, routing and destroying nearly the entire detachment. The larger force however remained, commanded by Cossinius, the legate and confidential adviser of the commander-in-chief. That worthy, doubtless, incredulous regarding the abilities of the man he was to cope with, so far forgot the rigorous vigilance of war as to indulge in the tempting baths of Salenæ. The eagle-eye of Spartacus bent upon the prey. While the Roman was thus luxuriating, the gladiators rushed with fierce rapidity and like a thunderbolt struck the spot, and very nearly succeeded in seizing Cossinius in the bath. He escaped, however, with precipitation, but his army was attacked by surprise, routed, large numbers killed and Cossinius himself in attempting to restore order was slain in battle which covered the field with the dead. The conquering legions followed up the victory and made themselves masters of the camps of the Roman army.

The report of this victory at the Baths of Salenæ spread like wildfire through the land. Slaves rushed into the camp of the rebels, offering their services in exchange for freedom. The newly gotten arms were transferred from the Romans to the sun-baked and brawny hands of the rebels. The drill and military manœuvre went rigorously and with great system forward in their camp; and while the hopes of the unsophisticated bondmen beat high the pride of the Roman nobility and citizens was mortified and crushed.

Varinius⁵⁶ with the remnant of his army, consisting of the greater fraction of the original force, was in the vicinity, or at least, not very far from the scene of the last disaster in which Cossinius met his fate. There are no data extant which give the full accounts of this encounter. To the student of sociology it must be announced with keen regrets that the entire three books of Livy covering the space of time between 74 and 71 B. C., are, with the exception of the epitome of books, XCV., XCVI. and XCVII., completely lost. A discovery of the lost authorities would indeed be a rich legacy to the science of sociology. Exactly similar is the fate of the great Libri His- toriarum, of Sallust.⁵⁷ Of all writers on ancient history, Sallust and Livy rank among the most plain-spoken and manly. By the epitomies and fragments still extant we know that these missing histories of the servile war were elaborately written; and judging from the careful study and insertion of figures, speeches and other literary condiments which spice their narrations we should, had they not perished, be supplied with a flood of new details regarding this servile war. Those inestimable jewels are, however, lost, unless some Niebuhr arises to rescue them from their dusty shadows. The triumphs of Spartacus were an unendurable stigma upon the Roman name, and the shame which the successes of gladiators and slaves inflicted, though it could not be effaced from memory, could be expunged or obliterated by destroying the books and by acts as barbarous as that which afterwards lined the drives for miles both sides of the Appian Way with the crucified followers of this general.

⁵⁶ Publius Varinius according to Plutarch, although Appian says Varinius Glabros.

Spartacus soon after made a formidable onset upon Varinius, who was overthrown, showing this to have been a great battle. Much obscurity hangs over this engagement.⁵⁸ Could the whole truth be revealed we should perhaps be presented with one of the world's bloodiest struggles; for we are informed by Plutarch that about this time the army of Spartacus had greatly swollen, and Appian declares it to have reached 70,000 men. The Roman general was overthrown. He lost all his troops, his horses, baggage, and his prætorian fasces. In fact he was annihilated; for we hear no more of him.

⁵⁷ See Schambach's Italischer Sklavenaufstand II. S. 6. This keen observer and critic considers Sallust's history to have been far the most authentic and complete of all. He says: "Am meisten zu bedauern haben wir den Verlust des grössten Werkes des Sallustius, welches den Titel führte libri historiarum populi Romani. Sallustius war von den römischen Autoren, die eine Geschichte jenes Krieges gegeben haben, derjenige, welcher den Ereignissen selbst nicht nur zeitlich am nächsten stand, sondern auch die meiste historische Glaubwürdigkeit hat. Vermöge seiner Stellung im Staate und seiner weitreichenden Verbindungen war er im Stande die besten Nachrichten zu geben, und mit einer anziehenden charakteristischen Darstellung verband er Methode und Kritik. Seine Historien waren sehr ausführlich."

⁵⁸ "Dans un combat desastreux il (Varinius) perdit ses troupes, ses baggages, son cheval, et jusqu' aux faisceaux prétoriens" (La Rousse, Art. Spartacus). See also Michaud, Bibliographie Universelle, Vol. 40, pp. 18-21, wherein we are reminded of the extraordinary allusion by Tacitus (Germania, cap. 8), of the wife of Spartacus having been a fortune-teller. She accompanied her husband through his remarkable career. Her name was Aurinia and Tacitus supposes her to have been a German. See Infra, p. 313 note 73. Appian, 116, fin., confirms the statement that Varinius lost many of his troops and his colors.

Spartacus from this time was adorned with the regular accompaniments of a Roman pro-consul. With a great army he overran the territory of Campania, ravaging and sacking Nola, Nuceria and Cora; then crossing the Samnian line into the province of Hirpinus he seized what he wanted from Compsa on the Via Numicia. Crossing the Appenines he marched his army southward into the rich peninsular division of Lucania. Here in the great fertile plains, between the mountains and the Tarantine Gulf, he was absolute master. His arms extended still farther southward over the domain of Bruttium in Magna Græcia.⁵⁹ In fact the destruction of the Varinian army had placed the rebels in complete possession of this whole portion of Italy. Here were pitched the winter quarters, B. C. 74-73.⁶⁰

But Spartacus well knew that he must not follow the voluptuous plan⁶¹ of Hannibal who, one hundred and forty years before at Capua, among the same valleys of which he was now master, and after the strikingly similar battle of Cannæ, had allowed his Carthagenian braves to be spoiled by luxury and wealth. Fixing his quarters at or not far from the city of Metapontum,⁶² which lay on the Tarantine gulf between the rivers Acalandrus and Casuentus, where the alluvial bottoms filled those parts of Italy with harvests of the cereals and the vine, Spartacus estab-

⁵⁹ Appian, Historia Romana, I. 117, fn. "Τὰ δ' ὄρη τὰ περὶ Θουρίους καὶ τὴν πόλιν αὐτὴν κατέλαβε, καὶ χρυσὸν μὲν ἢ ἀργυρὸν τοὺς ἐμπόρους ἐσφέρειν ἐκώλυε, καὶ κεκτῆσθαι τοὺς αὐτοῦ, μόνον δὲ σίδηρον καὶ χαλκὸν ἐνοῦντο πολλοῦ, καὶ τοὺς ἐσφέροντας οὐκ ἠδίκουν. ὅθεν ἀδρόαυς ὕλης εὐπορήσαντες εὖ παρεσκευάσαντο, καὶ θαμινὰ ἐπὶ λεηλασίας ἐξήσαν. Ῥωμαίοις τε πάλιν συνενεχθέντες ἐς χεῖρας ἐκράτουν καὶ τότε, καὶ λείας πολλῆς γέμοντες ἐπαγγέσαν."

⁶⁰ Schambach, Italischer Sklavenaufstand, III, S. 18, makes the war to have commenced in the summer of B. C. 74, which we follow, Idem, S. 20, Schambach draws from the Vatican fragments of Sallust as follows: "Nachdem Spartacus alle Elemente der empörung, welche Campanien darbot, an sich gezogen, wandte er sich in andere gegenden. Leider sind wir über die Route, die er einschlug, nicht genau unterrichtet; doch dürfen wir an der Hand der vatikanischen Fragmente des Salust mit denen Orosius übereinstimmt, annehmen, dass er sich zunächst quer durch die Halbinsel an die Küsten des adriatischen Meeres wandte, von wo er dann die Richtung nach Süden einschlug und nach Lukanien gelangte. Wenigstens berechtigen uns die Fragmente des Salust zu der Annahme, dass Varinius, von dem weiterhin die Rede sein wird, in Picenum den Aufständischen gegenüber gestanden habe. Auf diesen Marsche eroberten sie Anni Forum und vielleicht auch Avellae, dessen Einwohnerschaft sich ihnen wenigstens zum Schutze ihrer Mark entgegenstellte. Dass auch hier die Sklaven ihren Weg mit Mord und Brand bezeichnet haben, ist wohl gewiss."

⁶¹ Plutarch, Marcus Crassus, 9-10, Smith's Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography. Art. Spartacus, Sallust, Fragm. Historiarum, III, idem, Gerlach ed., p. 254 Pliny Nat. Hist., XXXIII. 14.

⁶² Cf. La Rousse, Dictionnaire Universel, according to which the camp of Spartacus was near Thurium, q. v.

lished himself for the winter, astonishing his historians by an ordeal of tactics and a discretion which the wisest and most virtuous might follow at the present day.

As explained in our account of the Roman collegia or social organizations, all Italy was at this period covered with social societies of protection, of resistance and for convivial and burial purposes.⁶³ To make coincidence more striking to the student of sociology, it may be explained that it was at just this critical moment that the Roman politicians who for centuries had been invidiously watching the rise and progress of the social movement under the law of Numa Pompilius, were busily discussing a measure for the wholesale suppression of the great social movement, root and branch. This law for their suppression did not succeed, on account of the powerful interference of the tribune Clodius, until the year 58 B. C. But we are not without evidence that everywhere the unions of labor were all this time on the alert, expecting the calamity and preparing for revolt. These unions were innumerable.⁶⁴ Italy and Greece were honeycombed with them.⁶⁵ Another proof⁶⁶ that this remarkable conquest of Spartacus in the industrial centers of Italy actually revived the organizations or turned their membership to his use, is seen from a slur in Cicero, the bitter hater of everybody who was too poor to live without manual toil. Speaking of them he says: "not only those ancient labor unions have had their right of organization restored to them, but, by one gladiator, innumerable others, and new ones, have been instituted." These words from such high authority, shed a blaze of light upon our conjecture that Spartacus was working in collusion with the disaffected labor unions which had either been suppressed or their existence threatened, as is plainly proved, at that time.⁶⁷ Thus Cicero becomes our most valuable and re-

⁶³ Cf. chaps xiii, to xix., infra, on Trade and other labor organizations among the ancients.

⁶⁴ Cicero who was incensed at the success of Clodius whose eloquence restored the right of organization to the workingmen, says: "Collegia non ea solum quæ senatus sustulerat restituta, sed innumerabilia quædam nova ex omni fœce Urbis ac servitio concitata." Cic. In Pisonem, 4, 9.

⁶⁵ "L. Julio C. Mario Coss, quos et ipsi Cicero memoravit Scto collegia sublata sunt," Cf. Mommsen, De Collegiis et Sodaliciis Romanorum, p. 73.

⁶⁶ Cic., Pro Sesto, 25, 55. "Ut collegia non modo illa vetera restituerentur sed ab uno gladiatore innumerabilia alia nova constituerentur." This inimitable satire, was, in all probability flung at Spartacus who had then been dead only a few years.

liable historian by his utterances at the bar, in the senate and his epistles. We must make the importance of this matter excuse prolixity and repetition. Speaking of these very times but apparently not suspecting the extraordinary concatenation of circumstances which we use in evidence of our conjecture, the great archæologist Mommsen, explicitly states, concerning the ancient conspiracy laws of this period which we conjecture contributed much to the so-called servile wars, that they were of two sorts. "Thus I have two points to note here: In the first, I do not think that the Clodian trade unions contained slaves as members; for I think the pure trade organization of skilled workmen did not admit slaves. They were societies for religious purposes."⁶⁷ Then the law of Clodius must be looked upon as touching only the city of Rome; as Cicero says: 'ex urbis faece'—out of the slums of the city of Rome. It was of such that Clodius would conscribe and classify. The fact is, innumerable unions of the servile race, as their relics show, were scattered over all Italy, derived from ancient times, under the protection of the provincial cities."⁶⁸

We are told that the young general after fixing his quarters snugly for the winter, instituted a rigorous drill of his troops. According to Pliny he denied them the use of gold and silver lest they should become demoralized by handling these vitiating treasures."⁶⁹

One thing is certain during his sojourn in Lucania: he set all the slaves free and declared such work to be his mission."⁷⁰ He also garrisoned the cities, although it is claimed that some of them he plundered. He committed no acts of brutality. He forced his soldiers to abstain from intemperance."⁷¹ He was humane to his prisoners.

⁶⁷ See Ascon, L. C., speaking of Clodius: "De collegiis restituendis novisque instituendis quæ ait ex servitiorum fœce constituta."

⁶⁸ Here Mommsen is mistaken, and he later on admits that they used religion as a cloak to screen them from the rigid laws.

⁶⁹ Mommsen, De Collegiis et Solaliciis Romanorum, pp. 77-78. The text is as follows: "Qua ratione conscriptio instituta sit et ad quænam collegia hæc lex maxime pertinuerit, iam exposui. Itaque duo tantum habeo adhuc adnotanda; primum cum servi in collegiis Clodianis essent, non esse cogitandum de cõlegiis opificum, quæ servos admisisse non arbitror, sed de sacris tantum; deinde Clodii legem ad Urbem tantum spectavisse, cum Cicero collegia et ex urbis faece constituta dicat et Clodium in foro conscripsisse et decuriavisse."

⁷⁰ "Quibus deliciis veneunt tam aurea quam aurata, cum sciamus interdixisse castris suis Spartacum; ne quis aurum haberet aut argentum. Tanto fuit plus animi fugitivis nostris." Pliny, Nat. Hist. XXXIII. 14.

⁷¹ Cf. International Encyclopædia, Art. Spartacus.

For once we have a record of a skillful soldier, a loving husband, a humble workman and a gentleman.

We are in possession of several very reliable evidences that Spartacus was married and that his wife shared his prison and military life. Plutarch is our authority for the first and Cornelius Tacitus for the latter. Not only was she faithful to him but she certainly became a celebrated pattern of fidelity, making herself by deeds of a true heroine, an object of praise to so great an extent that Tacitus holds her up as an example of the heroic character of German women. Her name was Varinia.⁷² "The most terrible guerilla chieftain recorded in history was unstained by the vices of his conquerors."⁷³

Spartacus had among his men, a large number of skilled workmen who belonged to unions. Among them were members of the Fabricenses,⁷⁴ armor makers; of the Castrensiarii, sutlers who took contracts under the old rule of Numa to supply the soldiers with provisions; fabri, workers in hard metals; caligularii, soldiers' boot makers or army cobblers and many other mechanics whom he engaged and employed in the manufacture of arms and other details of supplying his army. There was the great order of the *Vectigalarii*⁷⁵ which had been created by Numa, upheld by the Twelve Tables, and for 500 years employed by the Roman government and all the Municipia of Italy as collectors of the revenues from the incomes of the public domain, but which had lost their employment through the usurpation of the ager publicus by land monopolists and their system of slave labor.

⁷² Plutarch, Marcus Crassus, (Langhorne,) says: "But they (meaning the obstinate slaves against the orders of Spartacus) relying upon their numbers, and elated with success, would not listen to his proposal. Instead of that, they laid Italy waste as they traversed it."

⁷³ Tacitus, Germaniae, 8. "Memoriae proditur quasdam acies inclinatæ iam et labantes a feminis restitutas constantia precum et objectu pectorum et monstrata comminus captivitate, quam longe impatientius feminarum suarum nomine timent, adeo ut efficacius obligentur animi civitatum, quibus inter obsides puellae quoque nobiles imperantur inesse quin etiam sanctum aliquid et providum putant, nec aut consilia earum aspernantur aut responsa neglegunt. vidimus sub divo Vespasiano Veledam diu apud plerosque numinis loco habitam. sed et olim Auriniam et compluris alias venerati sunt, non adulatione, neque tamquam facerent deas." It is said that this "Aurinia" was the wife of Spartacus.

⁷⁴ Smith's Dictionary of Roman Biography, Art. Spartacus.

⁷⁵ Orell., Inscriptionem Latinarum Collectio, Nos. 4,079, 4,083, and infra Armors, chapter XV, pp. 872-88, Trade unions. There are many inscriptions showing that the blacksmiths, armorers and other iron and metal workers existed at that time in lower Italy, under the collegia or trade organizations.

⁷⁶ Orell., Inscr. Lat. Collectio, Vol. II. of Collegia, Corpora, Sodalia et cæ, pp. 227-246. Also index, Vol. III.

These he furnished with work and wages, by sending them en revanche, to collect from the rich who had usurped the lands, the provisions and money for his army and its expenses. Thus Spartacus, in the granary of Italy became the master workman of all the secret unions of trades and laborers; and we have no evidence disproving the immense popularity to which he unquestionably arose among the wage earners.

The army by this time, which must have been the early spring of B. C. 73, was swollen to 100,000⁷⁷ men, armed and well equipped, in readiness to battle with the mightiest force Rome could muster. With this splendid force he now meditated a daring attempt on Rome.

But one great misfortune now began insidiously to exhibit itself. His army, especially that division of the Gauls under Crixus, his hitherto faithful lieutenant, began to show signs of jealousy. Of all the fratricidal passions that curse and wither the hopes and career of the organizations of labor, jealousy is the most venomous and deadly. Born of the human spirit, it runs in lurid juices as of the cobra's fangs, and strikes death under cover of fascination. With the adder's blindness it envenoms the atmosphere by puffs, mistaken for zephyrs and balm, and to the innocent like Spartacus it throttles the spirit with the dark moral shadows of doom.

Had this insidious spectre not appeared, the army of the gladiators and workingmen might perhaps have succeeded, to some extent, in a desperate march on Rome and thereby—although its conquest was out of the question—some wise negotiation might have succeeded in much permanent good to the proletaries. But the exact opposite was in the end the result. The plan of this campaign was not carried out.

The camp at Metapontum was constantly visited by

⁷⁷ Cf. Smith's Dictionary of Roman Biography, Art. Spartacus; Schambach, Der Italische Sklavenaufstand. Appian makes it to have been 120,000; and Spartacus seriously contemplated an invasion of Rome, he says, cap. 117, lib. I: "Ο δὲ Σπάρτακος τριακοσίους Ῥωμαίων αἰχμαλώτους ἐναγίσας Κρίξῳ, δώδεκα μυριάσι πεζῶν ἐς Ῥώμην ἠπείγετο, τὰ ἄχρηστα τῶν σκευῶν κατακαύσας καὶ τοὺς αἰχμαλώτους πάντας ἀνελὼν καὶ ἐπισφάξας τὰ ὑποζύγια, ἵνα κοῦφος εἴη· αὐτομόλων τε πολλῶν αὐτῷ προσιόντων οὐδένα προσίετο. καὶ τῶν ὑπᾶτων αὐτόν αὖθις περὶ τὴν Πικηνίτιδα γῆν ὑποστάντων, μέγας ἀγὼν ἕτερος ὅδε γίγνεται, καὶ μεγάλη καὶ τότε ᾔσσο Ῥωμαίων." This was after the battle of Garganos and the death of Crixus. See infra. So Julius Obsequens, vide Lycosthens, De Prodigis, 118: "Armorum horrendo clamore" (from Capua) "centum millia hominum consumpta Italico civilique bello relato est."

for a Roman holiday." The unfortunate Crixus, less discreet than intrepid rushed into the din of strife and in a furious battle which occupied the day was slain and his army defeated with great loss.

The routed soldiers, however, had one comfort. They could go back to their general better qualified through the lesson, with confidence in their sagacious chieftain whom they had deserted. Even this rebuke did not entirely quell the terribly revolutionary character of his insubordinate troops.

Spartacus now started over the Appennines in forced marches northward toward the river Po, dogged every inch of the route by the large consular armies of Rome under C. Cornelius Lentulus and Gellius Poplicola, the two consuls and Q. Arrius the prætor, who commanded the third consular army. But he sustained no losses. Every time the enemy ventured a battle he was sure to be hacked and punished by the terrible columns of the now veteran proletaries.⁸¹

Spartacus appears to have bent every energy toward making a permanent escape from Italy. In the struggle to make headway, the sallies of the enemy in flank and rear were always met by the wary gladiator with a shock which stupefied and annihilated them; and in this manner he contested every attack, watching with a judicious eye every movement of the several Roman armies, for opportunities to inflict the heaviest blows.

At last, in one of his wily manœuvres he succeeded in alluring Poplicola and his large army into a place suitable, as he believed, to make a general attack. We are a little undecided as to where this bloody battle took place. There are data to the effect that Spartacus now had 70,000 men in solid column.⁸² But most of the great histories being lost, the lesser writers of those times perhaps ashamed of what they considered a humiliation and disgrace, rush over the less prominent events, mentioning only in an obscure manner, certain points.

⁸¹ Flor., III. 20, 10. "Inde jam consulares quoque aggressus, in Appennino Lentuli exercitum percecudit: apud Mutinam Cali Cassii castra delevit."

⁸² It is probable that the rebel force was still stronger than this; for Appian puts it at 120,000 while yet in Thuria. Vallejus Paterculus, however, seems to carry the idea that it was less: "quorum numerus in tantum adolevit utque ultimo dimicavere acie XL millia hominum se Romano exercitui opposuerint." But his scholiast edition finds fault with these figures, as absurd and refers to Eutropius who says 60,000. Orosius and Livy, who make the rebel force about this time to have been a medium between 120,000 (Appian's statement) and 40,000 that of Vallejus), concluding that the "C." of the latter author must have been changed in vicissitudes of so many ages into an "L," and that it originally read XC. millia or 90,000.

The tactics of Poplicola were to harass the flank while Lentulus kept his army in the front of Spartacus who took no further notice of the latter than to keep him from doing mischief. When at last, Spartacus saw his opportunity, burning with a desire to avenge Crixus, who had fallen at Mt. Garganus, he gave his men the long coveted order of attack.

A great and bloody battle was fought. All day the glitter of helmets and the clash of swords told the horrid tale of death. It was a rencounter of Greek and Gaul and Roman—representatives of the bravest lands of ancient days.

Phalanx by phalanx, the proud army of Poplicola gave way before the intrepid assaults of the laborers. No sooner did the Romans begin to weaken and bend than the carnage redoubled. Spartacus made good every opportunity and crashed upon the now broken columns of his adversary. Thousands of the Romans fell dead and dying. A few escaped. Night brought the slaughter to a sullen close.⁸³ The victorious legions of Spartacus returned to their tents to rest. Large numbers of prisoners had fallen into their hands, among whom were many haughty Roman knights. Spartacus with bitter irony soon afterwards forced them to fight as gladiators in the funeral games which he celebrated with pomp to the manes of Crixus.⁸⁴

Thus we have an account of the fifth battle won by this

⁸³ Florus, III. 20, 12, is greatly grieved at this humiliation; "a quo pulsī, fugatique (pudet dicere) hostes in extrema Italiæ refugerunt."

⁸⁴ "Sur la route il rencontra et écrasa deux armées consulaires, deux autres prétoiriennes et arriva enfin tout combatant et toujours victorieux sur les rives du Po, dont les eaux débordées lui barrèrent le chemin." La Roussé, Art. Spartacus. Plutarch, Crassus, tr. Langhorne, IX. says: "Lentulus, the other consul, endeavoured to surround Spartacus, with his forces, which were very considerable. Spartacus met him fairly in the field, beat his lieutenants, and stripped them of their baggage." Scraps from the earliest and best authors serve where the thread of the story is lost; and indicate the truthfulness of the history. Sallust has one as follows, which though badly mangled, seems to relate to this severe contest: * * * "M or Trequii præter s r ciem necessariam haud multo secus quam ferro noceri poterat. At Varinius, dum hæc aguntur à fugitivis, ægra parte militum autumnī gravitate, neque ex postrema fuga, cum se vero edicto juberentur, ullis ad signa redeuntibus, et qui relinqui erant per summa figitis detrectantibus militiam. Quæstorem suum C. Thoranium ex quo præsentē vera facillime noscerunt, * * * commiserant, et tamen interim quum volentibus numero quatuor."

⁸⁵ Florus, III. 20. "Qui defunctorum quoque prælio ducum funera impera

merchants who purchased brass and iron and other goods on a large scale. We are told that it presented the spectacle of a great fair.

Spring came and it was learned that three consular armies, fully equipped, were on their way to meet the forces of the rebels; and Spartacus took up his line of march northward, keeping the shores of the Adriatic. The object of this movement was to reach the Alps, cross them and disperse the army at the point where the Gauls might return in safety to their homes to the northward and the Thracians might take to the right and thus reach their homes in Thrace.⁷⁸ It appears that Crixus and Oenomans had remained with Spartacus at the winter quarters but that there was a quarrel. The evidences also tend to prove that Crixus and a large detachment of the Gauls separated from the main army on the march northward. Œnomans also had a falling out; for it seems he undertook an expedition to the westward of the main army under Spartacus on the march through Picenum near the Adriatic Sea. This expedition of Œnomans was undertaken contrary to the wishes of Spartacus and to gratify a desire for plunder. This lieutenant was met by Gellius⁷⁹ commanding one of the three consular armies sent out by the Romans, and in the battle which followed, he was killed, his army routed and those soldiers who escaped were glad to get safely back to their general-in-chief who never ventured a battle without knowing beforehand that he had some chances in his favor.

⁷⁸ No writer disagrees from the main statement that the central and longing idea of Spartacus was to reach his native home and again enjoy the occupation of peace. Plutarch, Marcus Crassus, 9, says: "By this time he (Spartacus) was become great and formidable. Nevertheless his views were moderate. He had too much understanding to hope the conquest of the Romans, and therefore led his army to the Alps, with an intention to cross them, and then dismiss his troops, that they might retire to their respective countries, some to Thrace and some to Gaul." Granier, next to Florus and the English Encyclopædists, the most merciless of the commentators, says: Histoire des Classes Ouvrières et des Classes Bourgeoises: "Spartacus, qui était un homme dont le cœur valait mieux que la condition, n'avait qu'une idée; il voulait qu'on franchît les Alpes, qu'on gagnât les Gaules, et qu'une fois là, chacun reprît le chemin de son pays. La stratégie des consuls et la mutinerie de ses compagnons l'empêchèrent de réaliser son projet. Schambach defends Spartacus against the generally accepted libels and slanders afloat in Rome and which acted as a palliative subduing the galling fact that the haughty nation was humbled by a low-lived gladiator: "Hält es doch Florus für nöthig sich mit den Worten 'magnitudo cladium facit, ut meminerimus' zu entschuldigen, als er den Namen des Anführers in einem der sicilischen Aufstände anführt! Aber mit der ansicht, den Mann einfach todt zu schweigen, begnügte man sich nicht; man befleckte sein Andenken durch erfundene Verbrechen und machte seinen Namen zu einem Schimpfworte, und selbst Männer wie Cicero und der ältere Plinius haben sich von den stimmen des grossen Haufens hierin nicht zu emancipiren vermocht. Uns, die wir keinen Grund haben, Spartacus als grimmigen Feind zu verabscheuen, liegt die Verpflichtung ob, seine Person in das richtige Licht zu stellen und gegen unverdienten Tadel zu vertheidigen," (Schambach, Der Italische Sklavenaufstand, S. 15. Dr. Drumann in Vol. IV. S. 74, sq. of his great History of Rome (Römische Geschichte) gives Spartacus this just tribute: "Die Natur hatte ihn zum Helden und Herrscher geschaffen, durch klugheit, Muth, Freiheitsliebe und Mässigung ragte er über seine Gefährten hervor; er brachte das allmächtige Rom zum Zittern, als er die Ketten zerbrach, und begehrte auch jetzt nichts, als frei zu sein; die Grausamkeiten seiner zügellosen Schaaren kommen nicht auf seine Rechnung, sofern sie nicht gegen die Unterdrücker gerichtet waren: nur gegen die Römer, in deren Spielen er sich und die Menschheit entehrt fühlte, die ihm nicht einmal die Flucht gestatteten, ihn und die Uebrigen einzufangen suchten, um sie an das Kreuz zu nageln, kannte er kein Erbarmen. Auch auf einer Höhe, wo Alles um ihn her den Schwindel befiel, blieb er besonnen; er wollte Rom nicht zerstören, weil er nichts Unmögliches wollte; die Vorhersagungen seiner thrakischen Gattin über die ihm beschiedene Grösse verblendeten ihn nicht; aber die Sklaven verwirrten und vereitelten seinen Plan." The inquisitive student of Spartacus may also consult a fragment of Varro, Charis. I. p. 108: "Spartaco innocente coniecto ad gladium." American Encyclopædia, Vol. XIV. p. 829, acknowledges that: "His own desire was to secure the freedom of the slaves by taking them beyond the Alps; but they, eager for plunder, refused to leave Italy."

But Crixus who was weak enough to be jealous in such a dangerous emergency was too weak to be victorious over the Romans. He rashly ventured a battle at the foot of Mount Garganus in Picenum, with his large detachment of the army, amounting to 35,000 men.⁸⁰ It is likely that he was drawn into an ambushade by Arrius who commanded the third consular army of the Romans. Crixus in his speech to the soldiers before the battle braced his men with assurance that it was "better to die manfully in the attempt of freedom than to be butchered

⁷⁹ Orosius, Historiarum Adversus Paganos Libri, V. "Œnomans enim jam superiore bello fuerat occisus." Schambach, Italischer Sklavenaufstand, S. 12, acknowledges the obscurity in which the facts regarding this lieutenant of Spartacus are enveloped: "Jener Œnomans muss bald gefallen sein: Crixus, der als der erste nach Spartacus erscheint, spielte seine Rolle länger."

⁸⁰ Livy, Liber, XCVI. Epitome, gives the number destroyed at 20,000 including Crixus. "Q. Arrius, prætor Crixum fugitivorum ducem cum viginti millibus hominum cecidit." Appian, Historia Romana, 117, init. "Καὶ τούτων ὑπὸ μὲν θατέρου Κρίξος, ἡγούμενος τρισμυρίων ἀνδρῶν, περὶ τὸ Γάργανον ὄρος ἡττήσατο, καὶ δύο μέρη τοῦ στρατοῦ καὶ αὐτὸς συναπώλετο αὐτοῖς. Σπάρτακον δὲ διὰ τῶν Ἀπεννίνων ὁρῶν ἐπὶ τὰ Ἀλπεῖα καὶ εἰς Κελτοὺς ἀπὸ τῶν Ἀλπεῖων ἐπειγόμενον ὁ ἕτερος ὑπάτος προλαβὼν ἐκώλυε τῆς φυγῆς, καὶ ὁ ἕτερος ἐδίωκεν. ὁ δὲ ἐφ' ἐκάτερον αὐτῶν ἐπιστρεφόμενος παρὰ μέρος ἐνίκα. καὶ οἱ μὲν σὺν θαρύνειν τὸ ἀπὸ τοῦδε ὑπεχώρουν." Sallust, Frag. Historiarum. We quote the following fragment to show the desperate fighting of the slaves presumably at this battle with Crixus—"Ingre, tante setui debacchoratur, nefandum in modum perverso vulnere et interdum lacerum corpus semianimum omittentes, alii in tecta jaciebant ignes, multique ex loco servi, quos ingenium socios debat, abdita à dominis aut ipsos trahebant ex occulto, neque sanctum aut nefandum quicquam fuit iræ barbarorum, and servilli ingenio: quæ Spartacus nequiens prohibere, multis precibus cum oraret, celeritate nuntios." In the next fragment we see the plans of Spartacus thwarted and Crixus on the eve of his overthrow and death: "Aliquot dies contra morem fiducia augeri nostris cæpit, et promi lingua. Qua Varinius contra spectatam rem incaute motus novos incognitosque et aliorum casibus percussos milites jam, neque tam magnifice fumentes prælium, quam postulaverant. Atque illi certamini consilii inter se juxta seditionem erant. Crixo et gentis ejusdem Gallis atque Germanis obviam ire et ultro offerre pugnam cupientibus contra Spartacum."

This great battle between Spartacus and the combined armies of the two consuls, Lentulus and Poplicola, took place a long distance south of the Po, near where Spartacus had defeated the first consular army under Poplicola; for it was in the territory of Picenum, nearly 200 miles from the river. The army of the proletaries was now about 100 miles northeastward from Rome and was marching southward. This arrangement of data brings the statement of Plutarch in line and clears up the whole jumble. The story of Cassius and his defeated army of 10,000 was Plutarch's battle of the Po. Spartacus then taking the offensive, marched southward into Picenum, where he fought the great battle of Picenum—the magna cladis of Livy.

Great consternation now prevailed at Rome. The news of the disaster to Lentulus and Poplicola and their splendid armies was regarded as a calamity. Indignation raised to its highest pitch and was only equalled by mortification and shame. A gladiator,⁹⁶ and slave, who, all his lifetime had been a poor man, earning a scanty living by manual toil, had combined audacity with genius, gathered the menial hordes⁹⁷ that worked the estates of haughty landlords and in eight battles, at hand-to-hand combat and at the test of strategem, endurance, valor and prowess had worsted, overthrown and annihilated the patrician gentry of Rome.⁹⁸

Lentulus was recalled and disgraced. His humiliation has always been a mystery to readers of history. The true light of the affair has been shut out—so dark was the history of this matter kept for ages from the reader's mind.

Spartacus was maligned by everybody; and public sentiment turned a smile in his favor into a heresy and intimidated the favorable opinions and conversation of the people as well as blockaded the will and the pen of historians.

Spartacus, everywhere victorious was, after the great

⁹⁶ Florus, III, 20. "Tandem etiam totis imperii viribus contra mirmillionem consurgitur."

⁹⁷ Livy, Epitoma, XCV. "Res proseræ, et assolet, statim invenerunt socios. multosque pastores, durum et pernix genus."

⁹⁸ Cicero, Ad Atticum, VI. 22. "Cum Spartaco—duce fugitivorum, qui bellum servile commovit, et vel cum quingentis prædonibus jam satis mali facere potuit."

battle in Picenum, forced to proceed southward by his foolish soldiers who, puffed " with success, were wanting in obedience and could not participate in the dream of Spartacus to retire to the pastoral charms of his native land. We next find him marching to Thuria, with a vast army and great quantities of plunder, with the intention of passing the winter of 72-71, B. C. But another victory was yet to be won before the army could reach its winter quarters—the battle with Mummius in Picenum.¹⁰⁰

It was now nearing the time of the Roman Comitæ, or the assembly of Roman citizens for voting for new officers. Among these officers consuls were to be elected. But so great was the terror which Spartacus had inspired that no candidates were to be found. This phenomenon is explained by the fact that whoever should be elected consul would have to go in person to meet the dreaded gladiator. Finally, after much hesitation, Marcus Licinius Crassus, consented to be nominated and of course, received the full vote and confidence of the people.

Accordingly, Crassus, prepared for the campaign against the great guerilla chieftain with eight full legions of Roman soldiers mustered for the occasion. But the fragments of the defeated armies of Poplicola and Lentulus, together with the prætorian forces, also shattered by Spartacus, were now returning to the metropolis in a straggling, demoralized condition. All these were soon joined to the new army of Crassus.¹⁰¹

The new confidence which this election of Crassus inspired caused a great number of young Roman gentry to volunteer, and we may be certain that the eight legions were full. A full Roman legion of that era consisted of 6,000 men which makes 48,000 for the new army of eight legions.

⁹⁹ Cf. Smith's, Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography.

¹⁰⁰ This account is given in Plutarch's Life of Crassus. Mommsen, History of Rome, here breaks the story of Spartacus and his victories into a tangle of unintelligible data, although its thread is seen to be quite clear, with a little pains.

¹⁰¹ Appian, Historia Romana, I, 118: "Τριέτης τε ἦν ἤδη καὶ θοβερός αὐτοῖς ὁ πόλεμος, γελώμενος ἐν ἀρχῇ καὶ καταφρονούμενος ὡς μονομάχων. Προτεθείσης τε στρατηγῶν ἄλλων χειροτονίας ὄκνος ἐπείχεν ἅπαντας, καὶ παρήγγελλεν οὐδεὶς, μέχρι Δικίνιος Κράσος, γένει καὶ πλούτῳ Ῥωμαίων διαφανής, ἀνεδέξατο στρατηγήσειν, καὶ τέλεσιν ἐξ ἄλλοις ἤλαυνεν ἐπὶ τὸν Σπάρτακον." Plutarch says: "No sooner were the senate informed of these miserable proceedings, than they expressed the greatest indignation against the consuls, and gave orders that they should be superseded in the command, Crassus was the person they pitched upon as a successor, and many of the nobility served under him, as volunteers, as well on account of his political influence and from personal regard."

extraordinary genius. The episode of his avenging the death of Crixus by forcing the proud Roman leaders to descend to the debasing ergastulum and meet in gladiatorial combat and with the weapons of dishonor they had previously forced Crixus and Spartacus to wear, bears at once a tinge of melancholy and perhaps of gratification even to the most enlarged minds.

Not only the consuls but also two prætorian armies were completely routed by the tiger-like springs of Spartacus⁸⁶ during this phenomenal march northward in quest of his boyhood's home. It is indeed interesting to know that his wife accompanied him in his wanderings.⁸⁷ There seems to be a simplicity and tenderness which contrasts with the magnitude and the ferocity of his adventurers; something unique and almost enchanting is felt as one follows him step by step along his thorny path.

After routing and annihilating these prætorian armies,⁸⁸ we next find him face to face with the large army of Lentulus near the river Po.

Spartacus seems now to have assumed the character of a fugitive, so desirous was he to make his escape. Time had been given for the remnants of the Romans, shattered but not destroyed at the battle with Poplicola, to join the army of Lentulus, now augmented to larger numbers than any body of troops Spartacus had yet encountered.

There was a prætorian, or "third consular army" mentioned by Plutarch. Livy mentions Cassius as a pro-consul and C. Manlius as the prætor.⁸⁹ This would imply that two battles were fought between the two great pitched battles of Poplicola and of Lentulus, the regular torilis celebravit exequiis, captivosque circa rogam jussit armis depugnare: quasi plane expiaturus omne præteritum dedecus, si de gladiatore munerator fuisset." So also modern commentaries; See Smith's Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography, Art. Spartacus. The American Encyclopædia, Vol. XIV. 1867, page 328, makes no hesitation in placing this humiliating episode as an event of the war, "At the head of 70,000 men he triumphed over two consular armies in 72, and forced his Roman captives to fight as gladiators at the funeral games which he celebrated."

⁸⁶ See Pomponius Mela. 21; Livy. Epitomes, XCV. XCVI. XCVII; Diod. XXXVIII. 21. Orosius, V. 24, 25. Cf. also considerable in the writings of Cicero, and in the various English and German Encyclopædias; these however, with few exceptions are childishy erroneous, contradictory and lamentably incomplete.

⁸⁷ Plutarch, Crassus, where we find this assurance.

⁸⁸ Cf. Smith's Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography; La Rousse, Dictionnaire Universel, Art. Spartacus, and Tacitus, Germania 8, where we find that her name was Aurinia.

⁸⁹ Livy, Epitom. XCVI. "C. Cassius pro-consul et Cn. Manlius prætor male adversus Spartacum pugnauerunt."

consuls. Cassius who was prætor in the northern portions along the Po, with a large army of at least 10,000 men, gave battle to Spartacus just before the latter reached this river. It was a deadly encounter, and though the conflict raged with fierce determination on the part of the Romans, they were no match for the now invincible gladiator and his veterans who gained one of the most telling triumphs of the war.⁹⁰ It was between these two bloody engagements and in this region that Spartacus spent the winter of B. C. 72-71.

The army of the gladiator now increased.⁹¹ We should be almost totally confounded without Livy's Epitomes of wrecked history at this juncture of the war, and could scarcely proceed. It is through these made clear, that after the defeat of Cassius and his 10,000 near the Po, as related by Plutarch, the really great battle spoken of, where Spartacus met Lentulus "fairly," was Livy's great carnage,⁹² told in words too plain to admit of misunderstanding.⁹³ Plutarch says: "the two consuls having consolidated their troops in the country of Picenum, fell upon Spartacus in full force. He, however, gave them battle and with great slaughter nearly annihilated them." This fills two missing data. We are all along told that Spartacus, while near the river Po, before these "great defeats" of the "two consuls and their two prætorian armies," was a fugitive, anxiously striving with all his military tact, to escape from Roman territory. Now, however, we have authors augmenting the army of Spartacus.⁹⁴ We find him with a vast and well drilled, well disciplined, well fed and highly elated army of 120,000 men.

A march upon Rome was frustrated by the desire of plunder; although it is stated that Spartacus did not dare to make the attempt.⁹⁵

⁹⁰ Plutarch, Crassus, 10. "He (Spartacus) then continued his route towards the Alps, but was opposed by Cassius, who commanded in that part of Gaul which lay about the Po, and came against him at the head of 10,000 men. A battle ensued, in which Cassius was defeated, with great loss, and saved himself not without difficulty." So Livy, Epitome of liber, XCVI. et supra, note 90.

⁹¹ Plutarch, Crassus, 10.

⁹² Livy, Epitome, XCVI. "Idcirco duo consules, junctis copiis in agro Piceno ei concurrerunt. Sed illa (Spartacus) licet eas magna clade profligasset."

⁹³ Schambach, Italischer Sklavenaufstand, S. 8, concedes the scholiast view. Livy did not write the epitomes to his books, but thinks that they are faithful to the original contents.

⁹⁴ Livy, XCVI. of Epitomes, of the lost books. Appian, I. 117.

⁹⁵ Livy, Epitome, XCVI. "Ad Urbem dæcere non est ausus."

10,000 slaves each, were freshly reminded by every victory of Spartacus, of the doom of their crumbling institution, sacred, as one of the pillars of the paganism they worshiped for a religion.

Crassus had cause to be severe. Plutarch adds that: "He severely reprimanded Mummius who had escaped unhurt. He armed the few survivors anew, insisting upon their giving bond of fidelity to the new arms given them. He took 500 of the most cowardly, divided them into 50 platoons and these into decades, one of whom was by lot, put to death; in this way recalling an ancient military usage of punishment. This kind of punishment in fact, is the mark of the greatest infamy; for as the execution is public, in sight of the whole army, circumstances that are awful and affecting follow."¹⁰⁸ But this horrible chastisement came late. Spartacus had again been victorious.

But two causes now set in to cast shadows over the glory of the conquering gladiator. His own ignorant and foolish soldiers began again to show signs of insubordination, elated by their never failing successes. They wanted to plunder and feast upon the fat of the land; and while they were actually becoming demoralized and dissolute in their extraordinary experience of victory, their new enemy Crassus was growing wiser and surer in his harrowing experience of defeat. These two causes combined to bring the terrible lion to his end.

Crassus, after this ferocious specimen of the cruelty of war, attacked Spartacus, and drove him to the sea.¹⁰⁹ But ¹⁰⁸ Plutarch, idem; Appian, Historia Romana, I. 118. "Καὶ τῶνδ' αὖ μὲν αἰτίκα διακληρώσας, ὡς πολλάκις ἡττημένων, ἐπὶ θανάτῳ μέρος δέκατον διέφθειρεν. Οἱ δ' οὐχ οὕτω νομίζουσιν, ἀλλὰ παντὶ τῷ στρατῷ συμβαλόντα καὶ τόνδε, καὶ ἡττημένους πάντων διακληρώσαι τὸ δέκατον, καὶ ἀνελεῖν ἐς τετρακισχιλίους, οὐδὲν διὰ τὸ πλῆθος ἐνδοιάσαντο. ὁποτέρως δ' ἔπραξε, φοβερώτερος αὐτοῖς τῆς τῶν πολεμίων ἡττης φανεῖς αἰτίκα μυρίων Σπαρτακείων ἐφ' ἑαυτῶν που στρατοπεδεύοντων ἐκράτει, καὶ δύο αὐτῶν μέρη κατακάνων ἐπ' αὐτὸν ἤλαυνε τὸν Σπάρτακον σὺν καταφρονήσει." Sallust, Historiarum Populi Romani, libri. Recensio of Anton, Thysius, old Lugdunum edition, p. 502, has a sadly mutilated scrap: "Sorte ductos fusti necat:" and the learned editor in a note explains as follows: "Sorte ductos fusti necat, Puto legendum, eductos, accipiendumq; de severa ac militari Crassi disciplina, qua idem, in fugitoribus coercendis usus, ex duabus Mummianis Legionibus contra edictum Imperatoris in hostem (Spartacum) pugnare ausis, profligatisque; quingenis primos, unde initium fugæ factum fuerat, sorte eductos decimari præceteros. Quod vetus supplicii genus intermortuum, ac desitum jam pridem, postliminio in castra Romana reductum à Crasso." According to Sallust they were killed with clubs.

¹⁰⁹ Appian. I. 118, fin: "Νικήσας δὲ καὶ τόνδε λαμπρῶς ἐδίωκε φεύγοντα ἐπὶ τὴν θάλασσαν ὡς διαπλευσούμενον ἐς Σικελίαν, καὶ καταλαβὼν ἀπετάφρευε καὶ ἀπετείχιζε καὶ ἀπεσταύρου." Mommsen, History of Rome, Vol. IV. p. 106.

this signal victory mentioned by Appian, is denied by Plutarch in the following terms: "After thus chastising his men, he (Crassus) led them against the enemy. But Spartacus turned back and retired through Lucania to the sea."¹¹⁰

Spartacus marched his army southward along the Adriatic to embark for Sicily across the straits of Messina. There is strong circumstantial evidence that privateers of the Mediterranean assisted Spartacus; and if we judge from this point of view, a new light is thrown upon the history of his career. No written records, however, exist proving this, and for want of it we follow the story as it is told.

If the pirates, so-called, refused to help him, thus clearly working in the interest of Rome, as Mommsen suggests, why should Rome have immediately instituted a man-hunt against them? Tacitus has some remarks favoring our theory that the pirates were faithful to Spartacus. Another potent question is, how did the gladiator get the great army of 300,000 men? Did not the privateers ship them over from Sicily? We shall refer to these things later.

This new move of Spartacus to reach Sicily is called by some, his last stroke of genius. It was an original one. There had been, some 27 years before, a great rebellion of the slaves in Sicily¹¹¹ and at this moment, when Spartacus approached that fair isle—the granary of Rome—it was suffering from the most inhuman exactions, by order of Verres, the insatiate and avaricious despoiler, whose greedy havoc was soon afterwards opposed by Cicero. The slaves and property owners alike, were goaded by this man's rapacity to the verge of rebellion against Rome. Had Spartacus succeeded in crossing safely with his army the chances are that the goaded people would have gladly ¹¹⁰ Plutarch, Life of Crassus.

¹¹¹ See chapter xi supra. The strange words of Cornelius Tacitus, Annalium, liber, XV. cap. 46; referring to Spartacus and the Roman flotilla against the pirates, show how fearful was the danger, and they seem to advert to the link of friendship existing between them and Spartacus: "Per idem tempus gladiatores apud oppidum Præneste temptata eruptione praesidio militis, qui custos adesset, coerciti sunt, iam Spartacum et vetera mala rumoribus ferente populo, ut est novarum rerum cupiens pavidusque. Nec multo post clades rei navalis accipitur, non bello (quippe haud alias tam immota pax), sed certum ad diem in Campaniam redire classem Nero jusserat, non exceptis maris casibus. Ergo gubernatores, quamvis saeviente pelago, a Formiis movere; et gravi Africo, dum promunturium Miseni superare contendunt, Cumanis litoribus impacti trirēmum plerasque et minora navigia passim amiserunt."

From the start, there must have been at least 100,000 men sent out under Crassus against the rebels, which force kept constantly increasing to the end.

Returning to Spartacus, we find evidence¹⁰² that while at the zenith of his popularity between the Po—which he did not cross—and Picenum, he offered inducements to all who would cast off the yoke of despotism, to join. That the slaves took the offer of freedom is evident from the number, which commentators venture to put at 120,000, and which we positively know soon greatly augmented. Many of the higher classes spurned offers to co-operate because they “disdained to join slaves;” although they hated the Romans.¹⁰³

When Crassus arrived in Cis-Alpine Gaul, near the city of Mutina, where the army of Spartacus lay, he studied closely the traits of his antagonist and concluded to adopt the tactics of Fabius who had previously been successful over Hannibal, by worrying him and not giving battle. After harassing Spartacus in rear and flank for some time he sent the pro-consul, C. Cassius Longinus, around on the other side with orders to be watchful and goad the enemy, without hazarding an engagement; but the fox-witted gladiator, with apparent indifference, allured this Roman into an idea that he could safely go beyond his orders; and attack a wing of the workingmen who were in reality, impatient for the fray.

At a weak moment, least suspected and least watched, Spartacus gave the welcome order of battle. The shout went up and with it came the force of the onset. Cassius was crushed by the unexpected blow and completely routed. The field of Mutina covered with the slain, remained with the workingmen.

Spartacus, slowly continuing his march southward, harassed and tormented by Crassus who was too good a commander to venture a general engagement, studied every opportunity to catch the Roman at a weak point.¹⁰⁴ Opportunity soon came. The proprætor, Cn. Manlius, was caught at an unguarded moment and in a terribly bloody conflict of which we have only a sullen and lugubrious mention by historians, was torn to atoms by the charge of a heavy detachment of Spartacus.

¹⁰² Cf. Larousse, Dictionnaire Universel, Art. Spartacus, based on the remarks of Plutarch.

¹⁰³ These gems giving the finishing touches of the story, are taken from isolated fragments of the broken histories, so badly mutilated indeed, that we should be loth to pass upon them, did not our inferences coincide with those of others who have taken great pains to get the kernel of the theme.

¹⁰⁴ “Le général Romain se borna de couvrir le Latium, n’osant hasarder bataille contre le terrible gladiateur et se contenta à le harceler et le faire misérable, par ces lieutenants, invariablement battus quand ils avaient la témérité

The condition of the Roman army was now that of terror. After the defeat of Cassius at the city of Mutina and of Manlius at a point southward, we find Spartacus, still harassed by Crassus, in the rich valleys of Picenum, the scenes of the next and ninth battle in which the gladiator chieftain was conqueror. Crassus posted himself here, in advance of the workingmen, for the purpose of intercepting their march southward.

Mummius, one of the most trustworthy lieutenants of Crassus, was sent round to the flank of the enemy, with orders to continue strategical manœuvres; and was strictly charged to follow him, but not to hazard a battle. Mummius had more courage and conceit than discretion or obedience. He proved to be precisely the man whom Spartacus wanted. The foxy gladiator now dallied with ruse and incantation and finally decoyed the whole force, consisting of 12,000 men into an assailable point. This whole manœuvre seems to have been deeply laid inasmuch as it contained an admixture of flattery. At any rate, however ambidextrous the incentive, the decoy on the one hand and the ambition on the other, prevailed.

Just when Mummius believed he was in the act of riding his country of a loathsome foe, a wild war-whoop of the mirmillions burst out along the lines. Spartacus at the enemy's vulnerable points gave the order of attack. This time it was many against few. Mummius was overwhelmed. "His whole army completely routed. Many were killed upon the battle field. Others terrified, cast away their arms and saved their lives by flight."¹⁰⁶

Again the arms of Spartacus were victorious. Mummius was annihilated.¹⁰⁷ Disaster again convulsed the ægis of slaveholding, degenerate Rome, whose haughty men, many of whom owned at that moment from 1,000 to de livrer combat." La Rousse, Dictionnaire Universel, Art. Spartacus.

¹⁰⁶ Plutarch, Idem; Appian; Mommsen and some of the Encyclopædias.

¹⁰⁷ Cf. International Encyclopædia, Art. Spartacus. Although we give reference to original authority there is a variety of readings and of opinions; and we therefore cite contemporaneous writers and recommend them to the reader.

treat of Spartacus—a retreat which for fine generalship combining fertility of expedient, quelling insubordination within, and overcoming obstacles without, may yet, when more carefully studied and better known, come to be regarded as one of the true models in warfare. The Roman general now thoroughly frightened, wrote to Rome for more help.¹¹⁷

It appears that after the failure of Spartacus to reach Sicily, a revolt of prodigious extent took place in his army. A body of probably over 50,000 men separated from the main army. They vaunted that Spartacus was a coward; dared not meet the Roman general; that they would no longer be restrained from giving the hated enemy battle. They accordingly appointed as their commanders two of the most boasting of the malcontents, Grannicus and Castus, and demanded of these inexperienced captains to be led to battle.¹¹⁸ They then provoked the army of Crassus to an engagement. When Spartacus, whose wearying sym-was once more in Lucania." Plutarch, Crassus, tells the same story, while Schambach, clearly shows it to have been the spring of 70.

¹¹⁷ Appian, I. 119-120: "Οἱ δ' ἐν ἄσται Ῥωμαῖοι τῆς πολιορκίας πυρδανόμενοι, καὶ ἀδοξοῦντες εἰ χρόνιος αὐτοῖς ἔσται πόλεμος μονομάχων, προσκατέλεγον ἐπὶ τὴν στρατείαν Πομπηίου ἄρτι ἀφικόμενον ἐξ Ἰβρίας, πιστεύοντες ἤδη δυσχερές εἶναι καὶ μέγα τὸ Σπαρτάκειον ἔργον. Διὰ δὲ τὴν χειροτονίαν τήνδε καὶ Κράσσος, ἵνα μὴ τὸ κλέμον γένοιτο Πομπηίου, πάντα τρόπον ἐπειγόμενος ἐπεχείρει τῷ Σπαρτάκῳ, καὶ ὁ Σπάρτακος, τὸν Πομπηίου προλαβεῖν ἀξίων, ἐς συνθήκας τὸν Κράσσον προκαλεῖτο." Crassus much frightened, certainly sent for and obtained both the army under Pompey, victorious in Spain and that of Lucullus from Asia Minor, victorious in the Mithridatic war. See also La Rousse, Dictionnaire Universel, Art. Spartacus: "Crassus écrivait au sénat afin qu'on envoyât pour le seconder, Pompée alors de retour d'Espagne, et Lucullus qui revenait d'Asie. Mais il repentait bientôt de cette démarche et recherchait les occasions de terminer la guerre afin d'avoir seule l'honneur."

¹¹⁸ Plutarch, idem, is one of our best witnesses on this great battle: "He resolved, therefore, in the first place, to attack the troops which had revolted, and formed a separate body, under the command of two officers named Cannicius and Castus. With this view, he sent a corps of six thousand men before to seize an eminence which he thought would be of service to him but ordered them to conduct their enterprise with all imaginable secrecy. They observed his directions; and, to conceal their march the better, covered their helmets and the rest of their arms. Two women, however, who were sacrificing before the enemy's camp, discovered them, and they would probably have met their fate, had not Crassus advanced immediately, and given the enemy battle. This was the most obstinate action in the whole war. Twelve thousand three hundred of the enemy were killed, of which number there were only two found wounded in the back; the rest died in their ranks, after the bravest exertions of valour." Livy, whose valuable history of this great war is lost is fortunately quoted by Frontinus, Strategematon, II. 5, 34, out of the 97th, the book of the Annales Ab Urbe Condita, as follows: "Trigintaquinque millia armatorum (fugitivorum a Crasso devictorum) eo proelio interfecta cum ipsis ducibus (Casto et Gannico) Livius tradit, receptas quinque Romanorum aquilas, signa sex et viginti, multa spolia, inter quae fasces cum securibus." This makes the numbers actually killed to have been 85,000. Undoubtedly this is the more accurate estimate; it also shows the enormous magnitude of the army of Spartacus.

pathies echoed his foreknowledge of the certain result, perceived this movement, he evidently gave up all for lost and resolved to die, bravely combating for his cause. Crassus met the seceders and a terribly bloody battle took place near Croton, on the banks of a lake in lower Lucania, whose waters, Plutarch says, are "sometimes pure and sometimes salt." The contest was extremely severe. Plutarch wrongly describes it as the greatest of the war. It was long before the army of the seceders gave way. Not a man flinched. Of the heaps of slain none were wounded in the back; all falling in the ranks performing the bravest acts of valor. At last, overcome by numbers they were forced to yield a little, giving the Romans an advantage which they took and killed 12,300, or as Livy, quoted by Frontin, probably more correctly puts it, 35,000,¹¹⁹ of the seceders, on the spot; nor would any of the proletaries have survived the slaughter had not Spartacus, by a forced march, arrived in season to interfere and put an end to the bloody work. But Granicus and Castus were among the slain.

Crassus on the whole, had made little to be proud of by this last encounter; for his forces were much more numerous than the seceders. Besides he certainly lost a large number of men in the contest, and perceiving that its effect was only to heal the mutiny and knit the rebels together into an indissoluble brotherhood by teaching the dangers of their temerity, he began to fear that Spartacus, now rapidly marching northward, was earnestly meditating an attack on Rome.

The army of the proletaries, still hugging the shores of the sea, was now nearing the Tarentine gulf on its march northward toward the port of Brundisium in its second attempt to reach Sicily by sea. Just after cross-joined him in overwhelming numbers, if for nothing else than to rid themselves of this insatiable Roman governor whose exactions, to satisfy personal greed, well-nigh brought Sicily to bankruptcy and ruin.¹¹²

¹¹⁹ Frontin, in his Strategematon, or Military Science, liber II. cap. v. 34, De Insidiis, instances this battle as one of the prominent examples of military tactics: and gives the great conflict in a new and interesting dress: "Crassus, Bello Fugitivorum apud Cantennam (Catanam) bina castra comminus cum hostium castris vallavit. Nocte deinde commotis copiis, manente praetorio in maioribus castris, ut fallerentur hostes, ipse omnes copias eduxit et in radicibus praedicti montis constituit; divisoque equitatu praecepit L. Quintio, partem Spartaco obiceret pugnaque eum frustraretur, parte alia Gallos Germanosque ex factione Casti et Cannici eliceret ad pugnam et fuga simulata deduceret, ubi ipse aciem intruxerat: quos cum barbari insecuti essent equite recedente in cornua, subito acies Romana ad aperta cum clamore procurrat. XXXV milia armatorum eo proelio interfecta cum ipsis ducibus Livius tradit, receptas quinque Romanas aquilas, signa sex et XX, multa spolia, inter quae quinque fasces cum securibus."

On his arrival at the sea opposite the Sicilian shore, Spartacus who had formed this plan of crossing over with his entire army for the purpose of recruiting from the ranks of the slaves, negotiated with the freebooters or brigand mariners, as they are mercilessly called in the histories, who from ancient times ransacked the coasts for plunder.¹¹³

They exhibited a quality of perfidy, perhaps against Rome—although the historians show that it was against Spartacus—which actually resulted in their being swept from their trade; for soon after the suppression of the servile war which they are represented to have been too treacherous and disingenuous to sustain, the Romans sent an expedition against them which certainly was a continuation of the great man-hunt ending in their own extermination.¹¹⁴ If Spartacus could have accomplished this magnificent strategical feat and realized his scheme of passing the winter in Sicily where the terribly-oppressed and down-trodden slaves would have deserted in vast numbers and extricated themselves from their otherwise hopeless servitude, he might, allowing him his wonted success, not only have beaten Crassus, but also the armies of Pompey and Lucullus when they afterwards arrived.

In fact, we know not what would have been the final result upon the human race—indeed, we are loth to speculate; for under the humane management of Spartacus it might have resulted in a permanent recognition of the honor and merit of human labor which was in those times denied.

It is enough to repeat what history relates, that the selfish, dishonest and treacherous pirates took the proffered gold of Spartacus but failed to land him in Sicily; for though his army enormously increased, yet his failing to get there probably disconcerted and squeezed him betwixt the mill-stones of peril and hope, leaving him heart-broken and defeated. It was the knell of Spartacus. What further the historian can trace of this great general and most marvelous genius is but the description of prodigious spasms and writhings of a dying giant.

¹¹² Cicero, Verres, passim. Here Cicero gives an eloquent account of this man's extortions. Cicero assumed the cause of the people vs. Verres and succeeded in obtaining a verdict.

¹¹³ Heeren, Peuple de l'Antiquité, Vol. II. pp. 170-173, of the French translation.

¹¹⁴ Liv., XCVIII. "L. Metellus prætor in Sicilia adversus piratos prosperè rem gessit." (Epitome); Vellejus Paterculus, Abridgment of Latin History, Book II. c. 31.

Crassus, watching from a distance these defeated manœuvres of the gladiator, conceived the idea of imprisoning him in the narrow neck or point of the promontory of Bruttium or Rhegium, by throwing up a line of circumvallation across this miniature isthmus with an object of hemming the proletarian army in and besieging it during the winter. The writer of the article in the Great French Universal Dictionary declares that Crassus was positively afraid to give the enemy an honorable battle.¹¹⁵ Spartacus, regarded this enormous line of retrenchments with contempt. It was an earthwork reaching from sea to sea, being, as Plutarch tells us, "36 miles long, fifteen feet high and a wall above this of considerable height—a work great and difficult."

It was now the winter of B. C. 71–70. The supplies for the army of the proletaries were disappearing. Something must be done. Spartacus watched his opportunity, bent on retreat which involved an escape from this trap. One dark wintry night amid the roar of a storm, while the forces of Crassus lay chilled, and torpid, least alert and fitted for surprise, the army of the slaves, at the command of their leader, burst from the bivouacs and sword in hand scaled the intrenchment, filling it with earth and wood, and in spite of all resistance passed over and gained the free plains beyond.¹¹⁶ Thus commenced the admirable re-

¹¹⁵ Speaking of Spartacus he says: "Telle était, cependant la terreur qu'il inspirait encore, que Crassus entreprit de l'enfermer dans la presq'île de Rhegium, par une fosse d'un retranchement de 15 lieus de longueur! Le chef des esclaves témoigna son profond mépris pour cet immense travail et pour des ennemis qui n'osaient plus l'attaquer en face; puis quand les vivres commencent à lui manquer, il combla une partie de la tranchée pendant une nuit orageuse, força les lignes des Romains et manœuvra librement dans la Lucanie, où il extermina encore les troupes des deux lieutenants de Crassus qui oseraient l'inquiéter dans sa retraite." La Rousse, Dictionnaire Universel, Art. Spartacus.

¹¹⁶ Appian, Historia Romana, I. 119: Σπάρτακος δὲ ἰσχυρὰς ποθεὶν αὐτῷ προσιόντας περιμένων, οὐκέτι μὲν ἐς μάχην ᾗ τῷ στρατῷ παρτί, πολλὰ δ' ἠνάχλει τοῖς περικαθημένοις ἐν αὐτοῖς μέρος, ἄφρων τε καὶ συνεχῶς αὐτοῖς ἐπιπίπτων, φακέλους τε ξύλων ἐς τὴν ἄφρον ἐμβάλλον καταέκαιε, καὶ τὸν πόνον αὐτοῖς δύσεργον ἐποίησε. Αἰχμαλώτων τε πολλῶν ἐκρέμασεν ἐν τῷ μεταίχμῳ, δευτέρως τοῖς ἰδίοις τὴν ὄψιν ὅν πεύσονται μὴ εὖτε. Mommsen, History of Rome, IV. p. 107: "but in a dark winter Spartacus broke through the lines of the enemy, and in the spring of 71

ing the river Strongoli, or Neæthus of the ancients, and in the very ancient town of Petelia, the Roman forces under the command of L. Quintius, one of the officers of Crassus and the quæstor, Tremellius Scrofa, came up with the intention only of harassing him in rear and flank, according to the express orders of Crassus who adhered to the Fabian tactics. Spartacus on being attacked by a few skirmishers in the rear, suddenly wheeled a large detachment upon the Romans who were not prepared, and succeeded in routing them so completely that the quæstor who was wounded, barely escaped with his life. It was another great victory.

But Crassus, who was a good judge of effects, soon perceived that it was the cause of reviving among the slaves the malignant spirit of insubordination. They were again so inflated with success that they threatened to rebel; and their miserable conduct forced Spartacus to take an opposite direction from that which he chose to march, causing a disaster by hurrying them onward to final downfall. Plutarch declares that the insurgents after this victory became so arrogant and mutinous that they drew swords and insisted upon being led against Crassus' army in open field. They demanded to be marched through Campania to Rome; and Spartacus was not long afterwards forced to give orders to march toward the now trembling capital. Yet notwithstanding this insubordination he could but admire their bravery and knew their impetuosity when led to battle. Plutarch in speaking of their valor at the battle of the seceders where, according to Livy, no less than 35,000 of the rebels were slain, says that they died manfully, only two of the killed being found wounded in the back. "The rest had died in the ranks, after the grandest exhibit of bravery." Spartacus, aware of the approach of Pompey from the direction of Rome, on the one hand, and of the expected landing of Lucullus at Brundisium, on the other, and knowing the folly of hope against these three great veteran armies combined, struck a forced march for Brundisium, thinking still to secure the co-operation of the privateers in transporting him to Sicily, before Lucullus hove in view. Though he could rely upon his soldiers' bravery he foresaw that a general engagement must be fatal.

Thus we begin to comprehend the strange reticence of the historians regarding the fresh allies of Crassus, now actually centering together. The old stigma upon the touch of a creature of lowly condition by an optimate of Rome is apparently the cause of the suppression of all histories which gave the details. There is one authority, however, which brings some of these marvels to light. This is Vellejus Paterculus whose History of Rome was early mutilated in all the manuscripts except one, which survived until it was printed late in the Middle Ages. Armed with this, we see better to follow the thread of this great rebellion to its close, and can thus correct some very misleading errors of modern writers.

The whole army of the proletaries moved to the seaport of Brundisium, where it was hoped to obtain ships and sail to Sicily. But here Spartacus was met and assailed by Lucullus at that moment in the act of landing his whole army, recalled by the senate of Rome to help Crassus. Whether much fighting took place we are not informed; but foiled again in his designs by sea, he turned northward harrassed and goaded by the veteran army from Asia in full force.

In these returning legions of Lucullus, was a man who was soon afterwards destined to play an extraordinary rôle, in favor of the proletaries, and to lose his life in their defense. It was Clodius, a brother-in-law of Lucullus, general-in-chief. Wealthy, of noble blood, educated, and one of the most eloquent lawyers of those days—a man who restored to the poor workingmen their right of organization, and who in doing this, crippled the mighty Cicero and brought him to disgrace, exile and final death. But we leave his extraordinary story for other pages of our history to recount. Suffice it here to say that the indescribable scenes of suffering and of horror which he was eye witness to in this campaign shaped his life-course ever afterwards, in favor of the lowly.¹²⁰

¹²⁰ Publius Clodius was of patrician blood. See Lippincott's Biographical Dictionary, Vol. I, art. Clodius. "Demagogue of a very profligate character of the patrician house of Appius Claudius Pulcher; served in Asia under Lucullus his brother-in-law; became a violent enemy of Cicero who had appeared in evidence against him; raised several bloody riots against the friends of Cicero when they had passed a decree for his restoration B. C. 57" (see Cicero, Pro Milone); schichte Roms. The Encyclopædia Britannica, refusing to mention special article-heading, calls Clodius "a worthless demagogue,"

Lucullus, according to good authority, drove the gladiator from the shipping and dogged him in the rear at every step.¹²¹ Pompey was present with the whole of the large army which he had successfully commanded in Spain. These facts we know; for if we do not find mention of actual participation of these two freshly-arrived Roman generals and their veteran legions, as being engaged in the great and final battle of Silarus, we certainly find them engaged in the man-hunt which was instituted on the same day. Plutarch also hints at the fact.

In apparent deference to Crassus, who was the real commander of the three combined armies, the history-manglers have evidently seen fit to trifle with the truth in leaving no mention of Pompey or of Lucullus in the last great conflict. And especially pointed does this suggestion become when we take into consideration that neither of these two generals was desirous of having his name mixed up with so disgraceful a thing as a victory over what went current under the name of a mob of gladiators.

It is thus made certain that the workingmen were hemmed in between these three experienced consular and veteran armies of Rome, in a mountain pass at the head while acknowledging that he "assailed Cicero with a formal charge of putting citizens to death summarily without appeal to the people," obtaining a decree from the people for his banishment 400 miles from the city. Under the title "Milo," the Pugilist and murderer of Clodius, the Encyclopædia Britannica says: "P. Clodius, the leader of the ruffians who professed the democratic cause was his personal enemy, and their brawls in the streets and their mutual accusations in the law courts lasted for several years." Thus Clodius, the champion of trade unions and organized labor is called "leader of the ruffians" who were the working people of Rome. The Lippencott Biographical Dictionary, Art, Cicero, says of Cicero: "His enemy, Clodius, who became tribune of the people in B. C. 58, and who was supported by Cæsar and Pompey, now manifested his vindictive malice against Cicero by a law which he proposed: that whoever has put to death a Roman citizen without form of trial shall be interdicted from fire and water." The fact that Cicero had committed such murders is proved by the actual passage of this law and his being sent into exile and his house on the Palitinate Hill publicly burned, thus consummating his terrible disgrace. We fail to see in these stern measures of Clodius in punishing murder, and in upholding the aged and respectable law permitting the organization of the working people, anything that would not be considered humane and respectable in the highest degree, if repeated right in our own blazing civilization.

¹²¹ Appian, 120, of book I. says: . . . "Πομπηίου, πάντα τρόπον ἐπειγόμενος ἐπεχείρει τῷ Σπαρτάκῳ, καὶ ὁ Σπάρτακος, τὸν Πομπηίου προλαβεῖν ἀξιώων, ἐς συνθήκας τὸν Κράσσον προκαλεῖτο. ὑπερορώμενος δ' ὑπ' αὐτοῦ διακινδυνεύειν τε ἔγνω, καὶ παρόντων οἱ τῶν ἱππέων ἤδη ὥσατο παντὶ τῷ στρατῷ διὰ τοῦ περιτειχίσματος, καὶ ἐφύγεν ἐπὶ Βρεντέσιον Κράσσου διώκοντος. ὥς δὲ καὶ Δεύκολλον ἔμαθεν ὁ Σπάρτακος ἐς τὸ Βρεντέσιον, ἀπὸ τῆς ἐπὶ Μιθριδάτῃ νίκης ἐπανιόντα, εἶναι, πάντων ἀπογνοὺς ἐς χεῖρας ἦει τῷ Κράσσῳ μετὰ πολλοῦ καὶ τότε πλήθους· γενομένης δὲ τῆς μάχης μακρὰς τε καὶ καρτερὰς ὥς ἐν ἀπογνώσει τοσῶνδε μυριάδων, τιτρώσκεται ἐς τὸν μηρὸν ὁ Σπάρτακος δορατίῳ, καὶ συγκάμψας τὸ γόνυ καὶ προβαλὼν τὴν ἀσπίδα πρὸς τοὺς ἐπιόντας ἀπεμάχετο, μέχει καὶ αὐτὸς καὶ πολὺ πλῆθος ἀμφ' αὐτὸν κυκλωθέντες ἔπεσον."

waters of the river Silarus. It is also certain that Spartacus, if not his whole army, now knew perfectly well that the doom was near; they had by this time all become frenzied for the approaching butchery.

As one of the most bloody and terrible battles the world has ever known was fought here, it is fitting to pause in order to minutely describe the scenes and to array our evidence, obtained with great difficulty, regarding the numbers of the contestants, the date of the battle and the carnage during its rage, and afterwards during the man-hunt instituted by the Romans—the whole constituting a cruel and awfully bloody page not to be found in the annals of history, and which to the people at large, and even to the students of our universities, must be regarded as a chapter of news.

There were in the combined armies of Crassus, Pompey and Lucullus, undoubtedly more than 400,000 men, most of whom were experienced veterans, thoroughly hardened to the combat and to all the rigors of the military camp.¹²²

In addition to the significant words of Florus regarding Rome and her massing the entire force against the insurgents, we have the auxiliary argument of reason which shows that it could not possibly have been otherwise; for evidence is not wanting that the force of Spartacus at the battle of Silarus, was no less than 300,000 strong. His army which at the battle of Picenum is acknowledged by Appian to have been 120,000 in number, by some unrecorded means which we conjecture to have been the collusion and co-operation of the privateers bringing men from Sicily, had grown to the imposing total of 300,000. Vellejus tells us this, in¹²³ honest figures; although they have been garbled by a merciless translator and made to read 40,000. This cheat would have actually prevailed but for the accident already mentioned, of the preservation of a MSS. copy from which the editio princeps was printed soon after the invention of that art, and a copy of which is still to be seen at the Vatican.¹²⁴

¹²² The conjecture that there were 400,000 soldiers in the combined Roman army at the battle of Silarus is not based upon circumstantial evidence. Florus, whose words are never regarded with distrust, tells us distinctly that after the destruction of Lentulus and Poplicola, and the humiliating retaliation by Spartacus, of the gladiatorial combat in honor of Crixus, the fallen comrade, these words: "Then, indeed they (the Romans), with their entire powers massed, bore down upon the gladiator. Tandem etiam totis imperii viribus contra millionem consurgetur." Accordingly we find the Romans soon sending post-haste for all the old veteran armies; one of which was in Spain victorious over the powerful Sertorius, and the other in Asia, equally triumphant over Mithradates. All surged together against Spartacus. See Florus, Annales, III. 20.

¹²³ Our accidental discovery of this invaluable information may be worth relating: The unreasonable figure of 40,000 given in our own version of Vellejus, in view of the great combined forces admitted by Plutarch, Appian and Florus

Supplied with these important figures, so long held back, but so perfectly reasonable—since they straighten out the incongruities which meet the reader who sees the vast multitudes of the Roman legions positively known to be now centering in—we find ourselves in a condition, otherwise crippled in absurdities and discrepancies, to make a better description of the contest.

Time was given for the army of Spartacus to make long against Spartacus led us to suspect that an immense error lurked in the history of the battle of Silarus. Ransacking for more light we ran against the reference to Dr. Schambach's Italischer Sklavenkrieg, which we procured from Europe after much delay. Page 11, Quellen zur Geschichte has the following: "Vellejus ist für uns wenig wichtig. Wir erfahren durch ihn nichts, das uns nicht auch sonst bekannt wäre, mit Ausnahme der Zahlenangabe, dass von 300,000 Sklaven in dem letzten Kampfe noch 40,000 übrig gewesen seien. In dem Wenigen, was er gibt, lässt sich ihm eine Unrichtigkeit nicht nachweisen." This not only explained the reasonable facts, but also vouched for the truthfulness of Vellejus. Setting out afresh on the hunt for the exact words of the editio princeps, we at last found a copy of the Lugdunum edition containing the MSS. text in a note.

¹²⁴ During and before the renaissance there appears to have been a not inconsiderable dispute among scholars over the figure CCC, millia, to be seen in the editio princeps of Vellejus, on account of this figure having been altered to XL. millia. We therefore give the rendering with its falsified figure, and follow it with the remarks of the Lugdunum editor written some 200 years ago, together with the perfectly trustworthy quotation from the editio princeps Vellejus, interpolated by a fraud, is currently made to say these words about Spartacus.

"Fugitivi e ludo gladiatorio Capua profugientes, duce Spartaco, raptis ex ea urbe gladiis; mox, crescente in dies multitudine, gravibus varisque casibus adfecere Italiam quorum numerus in tantum adolevit, ut qua ultimo dimicavere acie, XL. millia (in the original manuscript written by Vellejus himself CCC. millia) hominum se Romano exercitui opposuerunt."

The remarks of John Campbell upon this interpolation are given in a note, very guardedly, as follows:

"Ut nihil hic mutandum putem, facit maxima scriptorum dissensio. Quorum in hoc numero diversitatem scire qui desideret adeat eruditissimum Traubhemium ad Flori liberum III. cap. 20, Vossius." Farther on, same note: "XL. Alii hunc numerum plurimum augent. Inter quos is qui minimum est Eutropius. Hic sexaginta millia virorum ab his collecta fuisse scribit. Apianus vero ad C. ac XX. millia extendit. Orosius, Livii epitomator, medium tenuisse videntur. Itaque vix ambigo, quin in Vellejio sit XC. Millia hominum Vossius. Nimis exiguus numerus, in quo variant scriptores, Princeps Editio, CCC. millia hominu... " Signed Heinsius.

In the Hudson edition (Oxonia), the text is the same as above; but the note regarding Heins is quoted as follows: Note 5; "XC. legendum esse non ambigit Voss. An XC. aut C. millia hominum scribendum dubitat Heins, QUIA EDITIO PRINCEPS CCC. MILLIA HABET HOMINUM."

This is sufficiently positive to settle the number of the army of Spartacus at the battle of Silarus, at 300,000 men, because it is the same wording of Vellejus himself who lived near the very spot and whose father probably commanded a division of cavalry at the battle.

marches westward toward Rome, in obedience to the demands of his mutinous soldiers. A straight cut from Brundisium to the battle-field could not have been less than 100 miles; as it was on the head waters of the Silarus in a nearly direct line from that seaport and Rome. As we have evidence of his having been repulsed by Lucullus at Brundisium, we can understand how he was followed by him all along this march. Crassus likewise, if not in the act of constantly provoking him, as we are inclined to suspect, was in the mountain pass of the Silarus when he arrived and pitched camp by its side.

The combined hostile armies now lay over against each other for a considerable time. Fortifications were drawn by both and the activities on the Roman side, of centering in, were given both time and force. We now find the two contestants face to face, each tempting the other to make the first dash. It was, according to Dr. Schambach's estimate—which we adopt as the most accurate—as late as February of the year 70 before Christ. The war had been raging about four years. But although winter, it is not in our power to know whether it was cold weather. Probably not; for the winters are generally mild in these portions of Italy.¹²⁶

One day Crassus ordered his soldiers to dig a trench and while thus engaged the gladiators made an advance, upon them. It proved the commencement of the great battle.¹²⁶ From a simple skirmish both armies gradually closed into the deadly fray and the combat became more and more furious. They eagerly welcomed the battle with reckless feelings of despair, knowing that their hour had come, yet staking their hopes upon another great and decisive victory.¹²⁷

Heroism, love of conflict, intrepidity and fearlessness

¹²⁶ Plutarch, Crassus, mentions severe coldness a month or two before when Spartacus ran the blockade in Rhegium. But that was a night squall. Besides the battle of Silarus occurred near the opening spring. This agrees with Schambach, S. 13.

¹²⁶ Plutarch, idem, 12. "Crassus, therefore hastened to give that stroke himself, and with the same view, encamped very near the enemy. One day, when he had ordered his soldiers to dig a trench, the gladiators attacked them as they were at work. Numbers came up continually on both sides to support the combatants; and at last Spartacus seeing what the case necessarily required, drew out his whole army." Trans. of Langhorne.

¹²⁷ La Rousse, Dictionnaire Universel, speaking of the gladiator says: "Sa troupe était affolée de succès."

of death were frenziedly seated on their hearts; but until now, recklessness had been a stranger in the camps of Spartacus; and when this came, foreknelling the desperate ultimatum, all mutually realized the approach of dissolution and were ready to drink the intoxicating potion which brave men taste midst the furious lunge of steel.

Thus a skirmish between the advance guards of both armies brought on the general engagement. Spartacus who was goaded by a hatred of the Roman leader, for some time stood off at a distance, eyeing the contest. Brigade after brigade fell into the murderous vortex. At length Spartacus issued his general order of battle and at the ring of his war clarions the two angry armies closed up bringing on the ferocious conflict.¹²⁸ They brought their chieftain his horse; but the gladiator, like Warwick, drew from its sheath his sword and with one blow of his strong arm, killed the excited steed; then shouting onward to his men, uttered the farewell speech of Spartacus to his soldiers: "Victorious I shall find horses in plenty among the enemy; defeated I shall no longer want one." Then poising himself he rushed for Crassus with his steel high in air and fell upon the ranks of his adversary in personal combat. "It was a fierce struggle. Long after the victory was hopeless Spartacus was traced by heaps of the slain who had fallen by his hand, and his body was lost completely in the awful carnage which closed that day of blood."¹²⁹ Plutarch says that he aimed to kill¹³⁰ Crassus; and toward this mark through darts and javelins he pressed, and over windrows of the dead, rushing in quest of his foe, whom, indeed he did not reach, but he killed two of his centurians. When all who made with him this mad and desperate plunge had fled or fallen, the terrible gladiator remained fighting with unflinching gallantry until he fell, covered with many wounds and so completely cut to pieces that his body was never found. Even Florus who had no language sufficiently bitter with which to malign him, says "he died like a Roman emperor."¹²¹ His forces appear to have fought manfully until the death of their leader, when the lines gave way and a hideous carnage followed. The Romans gave no quarter. Sixty thousand workingmen fell in this glorious defeat—glorious in the appreciation of all who admire feats of sublimest valor; but alas, a defeat which for centuries riveted the chains of the servile race.

¹²⁸ Appian, I. 120: "Γενομένης δὲ τῆς μάχης μακρᾶς τε καὶ καρτερᾶς ὡς ἐν ἀπογνώσει τοσῶνδε μυριάδων, τιτρώσκεται ἐς τὸν μηρὸν ὁ Σπάρτακος δορατίῳ, καὶ συγκάμψας τὸ γόνυ καὶ προβαγὼν τὴν ἀσπίδα πρὸς τοὺς ἐπιόντας ἀπεμάχετο, μέχρι καὶ αὐτὸς καὶ πολὺ πλῆθος ἀμφ' αὐτὸν κυκλωθέντες ἔπεσον."

¹²⁹ Smith's Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography, Art. Spartacus.

¹³⁰ Plutarch, Crassus, 12.

We paraphrase Appian for the following, on the close and consequence of this terrible scene: The butchery by the Romans surpassed the power of counting, for it covered many thousands. The body of Spartacus lay dead on the field. Great numbers fled to the mountains after the battle, and Crassus pursued them. They, however, reorganizing themselves into four divisions fought back, until all were destroyed except 6,000 who were crucified upon the high-road from Capua to Rome.

These "many thousands" slaves who escaped to the mountains as here reported by Appian were the 40,000 of Vallejus, in his editio princeps which we have used on the assurance of Dr. Schambach.¹²² This would make the number of men who fell in the battle after and before the death of their leader and including the carnage of the route, when no man was spared and no quarter given, to foot up 260,000—an immense number—but when we reflect that there reigned an internecine spirit breathing only vengeance and void of feeling throughout the great Roman army, and contemplate the possible strokes of such swordsmen, under orders to exterminate their now defenseless victims, these numbers are not surprising.

A few more words and the tragedy is told. Such were the numbers of the brave veterans of this great revolt who fell in the gigantic contest on the banks of the river Silarus.¹²³ In the mountains, during the pursuit great numbers more fell, and 6,000 were taken prisoners of war. The remainder of the great army who after the defeat, and the death of their beloved and faithful leader, endeavored to escape, was indeed small.

¹²¹ "Spartacus ipse in primo agmine fortissime dimicans, quasi Imperator equis eest," (Florus, liber III. cap. 30).

¹²² Heinsius distinctly says that Vallejus put the number of the army of Spartacus at 360,000, from which total 40,000 escaped. "qua editio princeps habet nulla hominum." So Schambach in Der Römische Sklavenaufstand, &c. or Geschichte, says: "Wir erfahren von Vallejus—dass von 360,000 am letzten Kampfe noch 40,000 übrig gewesen seien." The two opinions and Vallejus Petrarculus do not at all disagree. Appian, l. c. idem: ἡ αὐτὴ ἀγῶνη ἀνέστη ἡδὲ ἀνυμνήσαντες αὐτὴν πλεῖστοι, καὶ φέροντες ἑαυτὸν σὺν σπάρτακῳ. Περικλῆς δὲ ἐκ χιλιῶν ἀνέστη, καὶ τὸν Σπάρτακον πολεῖν. οὗτος δ' ἐκ πλεῖστον ἦν ἐκ τοῦ στρατοῦ, ἐν τῇ μάχῃ ἀποφύγοντες ἀνέστησαν."

description of the Silarus and the surrounding region see Strabo, v. cap. 4.

According to Appian, the pursuit was made by Pompey who must have participated in the battle. This grasping egotist easily finished the massacre and then vaunted that he had been the principle in putting down the rebellion; thus adding to the proof that all the three Roman armies were massed. Great numbers of the fugitives were overtaken and crucified. Every one of the 6,000 who fell prisoners at the battle of Silarus and in the mountains was hung on the cross along the Appian way; and for months their bodies dangled there to delight the vengeance-loving gentry who, on their drives to and from the cities of Rome and Capua, rejoiced to behold such sights as in our time would provoke the shame and contempt of the world.

Slavery from the downfall of Spartacus, the last emancipator, had an unhindered sweep in Rome and her provinces until Jesus, 100 years later, founded or brought into the open world the culture of the communes hitherto compulsorily secret; that mankind at birth are naturally free and equal—a culture which is based upon peace and submission; the antithesis of the plans of Eunus, Athion, Spartacus and all revolters. This plan was original in Jesus, and it has prevailed; for chattel ownership of man by man has, under his open culture, disappeared from the earth. Rome became “a model of rapacity, dishonesty and fraud; having in her period—almost a thousand years, produced scarcely a dozen men whose names have descended to posterity with an untarnished fame.”¹²⁴

But if Spartacus, whose acts were in Italy, might be called a Roman, he certainly may be included in the list of names of the untarnished famous; for his nature was gentle though his character was marked and equal to the dignity of grander victories than came into the list of the Scipios or the Cæsars—since he fought entirely for a principle, dying as his wife had predicted of him, happy in the enthusiasm of an exuberant, manly swoop of nerve and muscle, grand, if not gigantic, amid the dismaying fury of enemies of liberty and of law.

¹²⁴ Carey, Principles of Political Economy, Vol. I. p. 247.

Immediately after the destruction of Spartacus and his army, another great man-hunt was instituted, similar to those we have described in the chapters on Viriathus, Eunus and Athenion. It lasted six months, raged with merciless atrocities and was followed by another exterminatory man-hunt against the pirates who, if we are to believe the histories which have been permitted to survive, were the true friends of the Romans, because they treacherously refused to assist the insurgent army to cross into Sicily. But as we have already stated, this story looks extremely flimsy and must be considered with caution; as the fact remains well vouched for that Rome fell upon the pirates and privateers with a powerful fleet commanded by Pompey himself and succeeded in less than a year, in annihilating them so completely that ever afterwards the Mediterranean was cleared of these maritime desperadoes.¹³⁵

No fewer than 1,000,000 slaves are reported by Cæcilius Calactenus to have been crucified and otherwise slain in the combined wars of the slaves who rebelled against the huge and inhuman slave system of the Romans. This estimate, repeated with reserve by Dr. Schambach,¹³⁶ comes to us not from Calactenus direct, for his valuable histories are, like the others, lost; but it is transmitted indirectly by Athenæus, whose quotations from the lost books are more and more highly prized.

But alas! Of what utility were all these outbreaks of human irascibility with their awful details of blood and extermination? True, one comfort clings: To die in the desperate attempt for freedom was better than to live in the griping coils of slavery. But "an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth" brought no relief for downtrodden humanity. It never has, it never can, it never will. The still lingering idea of a semi-belligerent force organized on the strike plan, so long as it does not choose the weapons of overt war, and sedulously abstains from military or other violent means of resistance and self-defense, may be in conformity with the reasonable methods of relief; it is unquestionably consistent with the modern age and yields the rough polemic and the intellectual jar which surges and jostles men into a conception of arbitration and political unanimity. But humanity in the awful and relentless conflicts we have described, of which this revolt of Spartacus was the last and the typical example, has had enough of the destructive, enough of the irascible, enough of extermination. Let us profit by these examples, and no longer remain regardless of the better and more promising plan of another master, and the next to succeed. This great preceptor constantly taught the working people "that they resist not evil;" and his are the precepts prevailing all through the civilizing inculcation of "good for evil," until, after a bi-millennial trial of the brutal instincts, the oppressor now perceives and is being constrained to acknowledge that "an injury to one is the concern of all."

¹³⁵ For the law commissioning Pompey to the work of exterminating the pirates, see Vellejus, Historia Romana, liber II. cap. xxxi.; and for a description of the work itself, Appian, I. 121; Pliny, Historia Naturalis, VII. 25; Tacitus, Annales, XII. 62; XV. 25, Bellum Piraticum.

¹³⁶ Schambach, Italischer Sklavenaufstand, S. 5. "Die Zahl aller in diesen und anderen minder bedeutenden oder uns zufällig nicht überlieferten Aufständen getödteten Sklaven giebt Athen., wahrscheinlich nach der übertriebenen Berechnung des Cæcilius von Kalakte auf etwa eine Million an." These doubts regarding the number would have been dispelled had the learned doctor reflected that the number of lives lost in the war of Spartacus alone exceeded half that sum. A quarter of a million of slaves were killed in the last battle and in the man-hunt which followed. No doubt several millions were killed in all.

Whoever has the curiosity to observe the results of these defeats upon the Roman people will find that all the blood that was shed had no influence whatever toward refining human feelings. About this time the amphitheatre began in earnest to supersede the older games of the Roman circus. The revolts had kindled up a fresh spirit of vengeance, and popular conversation inflamed the hideous passion for sights in the gladiatorial ring.

These revolts had moreover taught the Roman politicians and all those who catered to power, that the slave system which made bondsmen of prisoners of war taken by tens of thousands in the great conquests of the past hundred years, were a desperate and dangerous element in the land. But a people filled with grudges as were the Romans, after this terrible succession of revolts which have been described, could think of no mild, humane methods of getting rid of the dangerous slaves.

To see them thrown to the wild beasts and eaten alive or to train them for the ghastly habit of cutting each others' throats upon the sands of an amphitheatre, was to their truly ferocious character the natural way of getting rid of them. This in part answers the inquirer's question as to the cause of the rapid and phenomenal decline of morals at Rome.

The comparatively innocent circus waned in favor of the arena. Vast amphitheatres were constructed in towns and cities everywhere. At Rome, where before it had cost the contractors great sums of money for men to fight in the games, the immense influx of slaves had cheapened the price, and this redoubled their activity until it soon became an absorbing business bringing with it a loathsome pest-hole of horror and corruption.

Surely the new plant which, in an obscure corner of the earth fell among such tares and thorns, must have had a prodigious work to do, in bringing into the world the wonderful spirit of sympathy and of moral sweetness which it is our great fortune to enjoy in this enlightened, slaveless century!

CHAPTER XIII.

ORGANIZATION.

ROME'S ORGANIZED WORKINGMEN AND WOMEN.

ORGANIZATION OF THE FREEDMEN—The Jus Coeundi—Roman Unions—The Collegium—Its Power and Influence—What the Poor did with their Dead—Cremation—Burial a Divine Right which they were too Lowly to Practice—Worship of borrowed Gods—Incineration or Burial and Trade Unions combined—Proofs—Glance at the Inner social Life of the ancient Brotherhoods—State Ownership and Management—Nationalized Lands—Number and Variety of Trade Unions—Struggles—Numa Pompilius First to Recognize and Uphold Trade Unions—Law of the 12 Tables taken from Solon—Harmony, Peace, Ease, steady Work, Prosperity and Plenty Lasting with little Interruption for 500 Years—Bondmen fared worse.

We have spoken of certain organizations among the working people of ancient times. That these existed is no longer denied. In Rome they were mostly freedmen. But what inspired their combination into secret orders does not appear plain to those who study the past for the sake of gratifying a taste for great events. Neither do those who study it for purposes of gleaning points in philosophy and religion as commonly understood, obtain any correct idea of them. The ancient contempt rooted in the taint of labor which slavery inspired is yet too strong; and there still lingers too much of the old spirit of paganism to allow of interest, or hardly of curiosity. This must answer the astonished student of sociology who asks why so much ignorance on the subject of those ancient societies.

Again, we have alluded, in a previous chapter, to the fact that writers and speakers of those days were extremely chary of information regarding them. The cause of this was identical with that which inspires the same thing here amongst us now—disdain. From 1870 until 1886, a period of sixteen years, little was known to the masses of society of the vast organization amidst us, down in society's core, except that now and then a strike, like a volcanic eruption, shook the moral and financial surface. Yet in that period the most splendid vehicles of knowledge ever before known, existed. There was an organized policy, mixed with contempt, silently preventing even a wayside mention of these phenomena. When in 1886, a decided stand taken by Mr. Powderly, pleasing the press which may have expected to see defeat and disaster of the great collectivity, flung the door of the mighty dungeon ajar, and a knowledge of their numbers and power burst out, the people were overwhelmed with surprise. How much easier then, was it, in that barbaric age, without mechanical means of transmitting truth, even had historians, poets and philosophers been inclined to do so, to close the doors against curiosity and the love of learning.¹

We begin by the broad statement that from the earliest times at which anything is known of them, although they were sunk in ineffable contumacy, they yet enjoyed one boon—the right of combination. Strange to say, no conspiracy laws are to be found; at any rate among the Romans,² until about the time of the emperors.³ These rights of organization in very ancient times, extended all over Europe so far as is known.⁴ Some of the first gleamings of this may be gotten from the authors. As early as Numa Pompilius'

¹ Mommsen, De Collegiis et Sodalicis Romanorum, p. 31. "Si querimus de loco collegii opificum in rebus publicis apud Romanos concessio. Sed id ipsum queritur, an querere liceat: est enim altissimum de hac re apud auctores silentium." Here Mommsen admits that the profoundest silence reigns among authors, in regard to these unions, and refers for his proof to a stone (vide Orell. Inscr. 4,105) bearing an inscription of a union. This was a union of musicians that existed at Rome. The inscription runs thus: "M. Julius Victor, ex collegio Liticinum Cornicinum." Mommsen alludes to this find in proof of the fact that working people had organized Unions of musicians.

² In page 52 of the Consular report of Mr. James T. Dubois, U. S. Consul at Leipzig, published by the State Department in 1885, at Washington, there is a reference to the attempted suppression by Tullius Hostilius of the Collegia Optimum; but that they continued to thrive he acknowledges in the next paragraph. A close inspection shows that they were by no means suppressed.

³ Mommsen, De Col. et Sodal. Romanorum, cap. iv. §10, p. 73.

⁴ Gruter, Inscriptiones Antiquae Totius Orbis Romanorum, 399, 4. 431, 1. "Omnia corpora Lugduni licite coeuntia." Cicero, Pro Sexto, 14, 32, says: "There was no town in Italy, no colony, no prefecture, no board of tax collectors at Rome, no trade union, not holding common cause with one another." This was during his struggle to suppress them.

time, perhaps 700 years before Christ, they are known to have existed in great numbers. This king tolerated them; and there exist some curious data respecting the system which he invented for their regulation.⁵ He ordered that the entire people including the working classes, be distributed into eleven guilds. This statement of Plutarch is however regarded by Mommsen as incorrect. The latter, after investigating the data given anterior to Plutarch, concludes that it must have been eight classes instead of eleven. At that time there were distinct trades, embracing all the arts of remote antiquity. While this may be true that eight was the number of categories there certainly is agreement among authors as to about that number.⁶ It would appear by their complete privilege of combination and their apparently perfect recognition by this wise king who reigned probably 700 years before Christ, that at times there must have been a great deal of skill among the artisans. Skilled mechanics were needed to make all the armor of those warlike times. During the reign of Numa Pompilius which lasted thirty-nine years the trade unions must have made great advancement.⁷ Indeed, considering the harsh treatment they afterwards received at the hands of the Roman emperors in later years, beginning B. C. 58, we are left to infer that for nearly 700 years of the best life of Rome these labor organizations flourished uninterruptedly.⁸ According to Plutarch, this ancient king so favored the idea of labor organizations that he made their particular case the very basis of a great reform. Plutarch tells us that he closed the temple of Janus for forty-three years,⁹ and all this time there was perpetual peace. The working people are known

⁵ Mommsen, De Opul. et Sodal. Rom., p. 78, says: The relics of innumerable communal associations of ancient times, are seen scattered all through Italy, as found among the inscriptions of the Italian towns. See also Plutarch's Life of Numa, much quoted by writers.

⁶ Pliny, Naturalis Historia, XXXIV. 1. "Æqualem Urbi auctoritatem ejus declarat, a rege Numa Collegio tertio ærariorum fabrum instituto." Again XXXV. 12. "Numa rex septimum collegium figulorum instituit."

⁷ Dirksen, Zwölf Tafeln, says: "Der römische Staat vergönnte ursprünglich lediglich den Gewerben, die den Bedürfnissen des Krieges und des gottesdienstes zunächst fröhnten, seinen unmittelbaren Schutz und eine selbständige Communalverfassung."

⁸ Mommsen, De Coll. et Sodal. Rom. p. 33. "Jus coeundi fuit antiquis temporibus omnibus concessum."

⁹ Plut., Numa and Lycurgus compared. "The primary view of Numa's government which was to settle the Romans in lasting peace and tranquility, immediately vanished with him; for after his death, the temple of Janus, which he had kept shut as if it had really held war in prison and subjection, was set wide open, and Italy was filled with blood."

to have had their golden era during the reign of this great lawgiver.¹⁰ If for no other reason than this, the reign of Numa Pompilius must ever be regarded as one of the most valuable, and fraught with richest lessons to the human race. It is true that this is not so considered by students of history from a standpoint of great historic events, or of religion and philosophy as ordinarily understood; but the student of history from the purely sociological basis may justly regard this reign as one of the marvels of the world. We are at a loss to understand how Plutarch, with his clear mind and honest motives, could have compared Numa with Lycurgus. But Plutarch was not a socialist. He did not understand the immense world of meaning rolled up in the mystic deeds of Numa, whose reign, had it proved a failure, he himself would not have praised.

But Numa's reign was by no means a failure. It was a decided departure from the customs of those ancient days, because it completely discountenanced the warlike ambitions of other rulers and cultivated the arts of peace. To carry out such a policy it was necessary to have industry made respectable and stand boldly to the front, and be in every way protected.

But the trades were already organized. He did not organize them that we know of, but simply accorded them free privileges to organize themselves. He classed his people of all grades by a method of his own and in that classification made a place for the workers whom he was wise and manly enough to recognize. Before the time of Numa the working people had never been recognized that we are aware of. His distribution of the entire industrial class into eight or nine grand divisions or trades,¹¹ does not probably imply that there was no greater variety than this, but it was probably merely for the sake of convenience.

We are not to suppose, because the free right of combination was given the working people by king Numa, that this carried with it all the immunities belonging to other people. Caste remained. They were still looked upon as degraded creatures. It was for the Christian era to declare the absolute equality of men. But this right of free combination, jus coeundi, was certainly used to an enormous extent as a means of working up a state of things and a spirit of freedom or self-constituted public opinion among working people, fitting them by slow degrees, to consider themselves equal to others. The right of combination during this remarkable reign, having been prominently and thoroughly established, it remained so for over 600 years; and we are told explicitly that no interruption occurred until 58 years before Christ, for both the efforts of Claudius and Tarquin to suppress them entirely failed.

¹⁰ ——— “Εν δὲ ἡ διανομὴ κατὰ τὰς τέχνας, αὐλητῶν (flute players), χρυσοχοῶν (gold workers), τεκτόνων (carpenters), βαφείων (dyers), σκυτοτόμων (shoemakers), σκυτοδεσφῶν (tanners and curriers), χαλκείων (braziers), κεραμέων (potters), τὰς δὲ λοιπὰς τέχνας εἰς ταὐτὸ συναγαγὼν ἐν αὐτῶν ἐκ πασῶν ἀπεδείξε σύστημα.” (Plut. Num. 17).

¹¹ Mommsen, idem, p. 29. Hæc si expendimus, videmus Plutarchum (fortasse etiam Florum) totum populum non opifices tantum in IX classes distribuere, quod etsi absurdum est, notandum tamen, cum inde nonum collegium ortum esse videatur.”

At that date much of the outcast and industrial population of Rome had become well organized and workingmen were, as we shall see, beginning to exercise a powerful political influence. They had been violently attacked by Cicero and other proud aristocrats and nobly and successfully defended by Clodius and a number of other Roman officers of high rank; and a fierce and terrible hatred attended with clearly discernible political manœuvres, was growing into an issue on the advent of the Cæsars.

Lord Mackenzie¹² says that "the earliest legislation deserving of notice was the celebrated code of laws called the Twelve Tables." Yet so far as the treatment of our special subject—that of the strictly laboring people—is concerned, these were but the simple recording of the old rules of Numa Pompilius and of Solon. In our opinion Numa had borrowed his notions regarding the organization of the working population mostly from the then existing state of labor organization in Egypt, Asia Minor and Attica.¹³ We have repeatedly shown every development among them to have been a traceable growth. Monarchs and lawgivers when clothed with power could arrange these habits of their subjects into words and forms but the people themselves had already been using them from immemorial times.

Solon, as early as B. C. 580 established laws permitting laboring people to organize; and made it compulsory upon boys to learn a trade.¹⁴ If the father of a family of working people neglected to do this he could not compel his sons to support him in his old age. Both Solon and Numa legalized the organizations of working people and gave them the full right of combination. Lycurgus, on the contrary,¹⁵ as we have seen, wanted no emancipated slaves. He was an upholder of military despotism. All labor being a degraded and disgraceful entailment, must, under the laws of Lycurgus be performed by the abject, groveling slaves. Thus in the Peloponnesus, trade unions got no encouragement whatever, which accounts for the paucity of stone tablets found in lower Greece, bearing inscriptions commemorative of the labor unions. Northern Greece, the islands, Asia Minor and Italy, on the contrary, abound in these suggestive mementos of ancient labor organization, an account of which the historians of those periods have sedulously left barren.

¹² Roman Law, pp. 5-6.

¹³ Gaius, XII. Tables explained by Dirksen, Mom. de coll. etc., p. 89. "Notabilis est hoc loco lex Solonis, ex qua sacra civiliaque communia etc."

All this proves that while labor was grudgingly tolerated as a necessary means of life to the gentile classes of both Greece and Rome, it was never recognized by either as respectable or hardly decent; if we except that of agriculture and the nearest it ever came to any recognition was during the wise and happy reign of king Numa Pompilius who extended every encouragement to its organization and died leaving it a veritably abiding institution as his laws intended.

He actually took salient and very suggestive steps toward filling up the social gap separating the high-borns from the low-borns of Rome. He instituted that at the Saturnalian feasts which occurred every December as a harvest thanksgiving or carnival, all ranks of a social character should be forgotten; that figuratively no slave, no social distinction, no arrogance should exist. Thus labor, for a moment each year, was raised up and the social arrogance of wealth and birth leveled down, to a par with each other. But it must not for a moment be imagined that the working people of either Greece or Rome ever arose to be considered by the gens, or patrician stock as anything more than plebians who were outcasts by birth, and though often the children of patrician fathers, yet through the ancient religio-political law of primogeniture, or the sacred law of inheritance, were relegated into bondage whence they never escaped except through gradual development by manumissions, and finally through the mighty all-levelling proclamations of Jesus which theoretically and at last practically overthrew every distinction.

¹⁴ Plut. Solon; Herodotus, Euterpe, cap. 177, gives us a hint making it probable that trade unionism existed in Egypt in the time of Amasis who upheld it:

" Νόμον δὲ Αἰγυπτίοισι τόνδε Ἀμασίς ἐστὶ ὁ καταστήσας ἀποδεικνύναι ἕτερος ἐκάστου τῷ νομάρχῃ πάντα τινὰ Αἰγυπτίων, ὅθεν βιοῦνται· μὴ δὲ ποιεῦντα ταῦτα, μηδὲ ἀποφαίνοντα δικαίην ζόην, ἰθύνεσθαι θανάτῳ.

¹⁵ Plut. Lycurgus and Numa compared.

But we shall more elaborately treat this grand and extraordinary episode in human development in our sketch of Jesus, from a business-like or secular point of consideration, as a subject of inquiry into sociological phenomena.

We now return to Lord Mackenzie's statement that "by the decemviral code"—meaning the Twelve Tables—"the plebeians gained a considerable step toward the adjustment of their differences with the patricians, but it was nearly 80 years before these differences were settled by the admission of the plebeians to the supreme offices of the state."¹⁶

In the first place, this "considerable step toward the adjustment of differences" was taken under king Numa, 118 years before the Twelve Tables were engraved upon the slabs. In the second, the very first decemvirs were composed of such tyrannical usurpers and aristocrats as Appius Claudius, who, although they had the laws adjusting the differences between patricians and plebians engraved upon eleven Tables, yet they prevented the latter from realizing their benefits. Another thing must be continually borne in mind, that under the sway of the Pagan or competitive religion, which was the foundation of law and social order, any absolute equality between patricians and plebians was impossible from beginning to end; and no assertion that the adjustment of differences was ever gained by any means can be considered correct. The difference between them always remained; but under the gracious adjustment of Numa and of Solon, afterwards inscribed in Latin from a Greek translation, in a formal law upon the Twelve Tables at Rome, the right of organization first came to the freedmen, in letters. Nor does this right of organization apply to the slaves, who still existed in great numbers. On the contrary we show, in our sketch of Spartacus and repeatedly elsewhere, that the rapacity of the Roman lords and middlemen finally became so great that they bought up slaves, redoubled their numbers, encroached upon the common farm lands and upon manufactures with cheap slave labor, each owning great numbers of slaves,¹⁷ and finally under Cæsar, succeeded in procuring conspiracy laws which suppressed the trade and many other species of organization, opening the way by sheer aggravations, for the advent of a completely new order of things in the repudiation of paganism entirely, and the embrace, mostly by these wretched slaves and persecuted freedmen, of a totally new religion which built upon the workingmen's fundamental principle that all are born free and equal.

¹⁶ Mackenzie, Roman Law, p. 7.

Thus it becomes evident that writers who speak of the three forms of Roman law afterwards known as the leges populi, the plebiscita and the senatus consulti, must, if from a standpoint of social science, be very careful not to count the two-thirds of the entire Roman population, who were abject slaves,¹⁸ enjoying neither freedom, respect, right of resistance or organization whatsoever.

The great trade organization received their first serious blow through the law which suppressed open work and drove them into secret conclave, counter manœuvres and diplomacy. We have said that historians carefully avoided any mention of these troubles. This is true; but the labor turmoils open to the students of sociology the true meaning of certain slurs occurring in the speeches and epistles of Cicero and others, the import of which can be explained in no other way.¹⁹ We must constantly hold uppermost the causes of the Christian idea skipping southern Greece in its westward course and planting itself at Rome and everywhere among the already existing communes, with a view of determining a solution to this phenomenon in the great social field already prepared there by these organizations.

¹⁷ Crassus owned 500 slaves, see Plut. Crassus, 2. C. Cælius Claudius owned according to Pliny, no fewer than 4,116 at a time, ". . . quamvis multa civili bello perdidisset, tamen relinquere servorum quatuor millia centum sedecim." Nat. Hist. XXXIII. 47. Great numbers of slaves existed in antiquity. See Wallace, Numbers of Mankind, p. 54, sq. Immense population during the slave era, pp. 294-303. Also pp. 91 and 97; Athenæus V. 20. Ancient Census and remarks of Hume, Ancient Populousness declaring that Athenæus does not reckon the children. Æmilius Paulus after the battle of Pydna, B. C. 167, destroyed 70 cities of Epirus taking the value of 10,000,000 dollars in gold and 160,000 people as war-slaves to Rome and the provinces, Wallace p. 300 and Livy, XLV, c. 14. See Seneca, De Tranquillitate, 8; Vast numbers in Crete see Lippincott, Pronouncing Gazetteer of the World, art. Crete. They were mostly slaves and freedmen; Plato Laws vii. 11. Countless Myriads of Women they call Sauromatides.

¹⁸ Cf. Wallace, Numbers of Mankind, p. 61. Liv. lib. 6, cap. 12.

¹⁹ Cicero, Pro Sesto, 25: "Collegia non modo illa vetera contra SC. restituerentur sed ab uno gladiatore innumerabilia alla nova conscriberentur." This

King Numa by no means originated the union of the trades at Rome. He simply permitted and encouraged what already existed. We now proceed to give some facts in regard to them. Although the king distributed the working people into eight or nine classes we are not to suppose that there was no greater variety of handicraft in his time. There are still extant slabs and stones found in different places in Italy, notably at Rome and what were ancient towns and cities south and east of Rome, bearing inscriptions which indicate that large numbers of trades were plied in very ancient times.

The Collegium a veritable trade union was originally an organization of working people for mutual aid and protection. During the 39, or as Plutarch puts it, 43 years of Numa's reign we hear of no contortion or prevarication of this word from that correct and original sense. But after his death, when the temple of Janus was reopened and wars and their harvests of brutality and repression disturbed the serenity of labor making the mechanics watchful of their interests, they somewhat changed their outward appearance but not their character. For instance, a trade union of to-day is often a protective, an insurance and a burial society. So it was then; but amid the turmoils, suspicions and dangers of war it often became convenient, in order to suit appearances to be exclusively religious. The Pagan religion was at that time popular. Each of the great popular, aristocratic families or gens had a tutelary saint or other object of worship, and it was very convenient for the trade union to dedicate itself to one of these tutelary deities; not only to elicit favor from the great patrons but also because they were themselves religiously inclined. Thus the colleges, although they maintained their practical economic or trade union object of mutual advantage in a business sense, often passed for religious institutions; and we have abundant fling was probably hurled at Clodius with a bitter reference to Spartacus. Cf. sketch of Spartacus, chapter XI.

evidence of this, not in the written histories but in the inscriptions which now begin to exhibit in a new and significant manner, their character and career.

The ancient collegia or working people's fraternities in Italy were not confined to the male sex. In later eras of the empire they existed in great numbers as the inscriptions show. Some of them were composed partly, and a few are known to have been composed entirely of women.

The learned archæologist, Johann Casper Orelli, has devoted 89 octavo Latin pages²⁰ to the enumeration of a collection of stone inscription-bearing tablets on which in ancient days, were engraved the wills of the deceased, the tutelary gods worshipped by the members, sometimes even the manner in which they came to their death, the degree of conjugal affection in which they had mutually lived together and many other little particulars shedding important and interesting light upon their mode of living²¹ in those ancient days—events left almost totally blank on the pages of history.

Gruter, another archæologist of great patience and erudition, has given us an immense collection²² of ancient inscriptions, many of which are accompanied by his own readings; thus laying the foundations for simplifying the keys to the study of sociology, and enriching the mind by a knowledge of ancient customs.

The archæological works of Raffaello Fabretti have also furnished us a large amount of material, while Theodore Mommsen has applied his usual care and judgment in making clear much of that which otherwise we might have overlooked.

The collegium funerarium was the burial society. After gathering all the information at our command, we are constrained to conclude that it much resembled the great system of friendly or burial societies of Great Britain at the present day. They existed in large numbers, especially at Rome; and in later times, after the passage of the laws of repression they were mostly exempt, because religious. Of this we shall speak later.

²⁰ Orellius, Inscriptionum Latinarum Selectarum Amplissima Collectio, pp. 274–360 of Vol. II. Sepulcralia,

²¹ No 4,352 Orell. reads: "Numisinae conjugii castissimæ et incomparabilis adfectione feminae cum qua vixit ann. XVII., Mens. XI., Id eb. XVII."

²² Gruterius, Inscriptiones Antiquæ Totius Orbis Romanorum.

From the prodigious labors of Muratori we also obtain several valuable contributions,²³ especially so on account of examples he gives, of genuine trade unions, inscriptions of which he took from Cis-Alpine Gaul, that were written early in the Christian era.

Rose, a learned Greek scholar²⁴ and antiquarian, wrote a work from which we find much evidence in support of our theme, especially regarding the high status in skill of workmen in ancient days; and the splendid work of Guhl and Koner entitled "The Life of the Greeks and Romans," fortunately well translated into English further intensifies our wonder at the high perfection to which the labor of antiquity had brought the arts and architecture.

From the analytical works of August Böckh, we have deduced considerable, proving that the organizations of the proletaries were by no means confined to Italy.²⁵ If Cicero could say they were "innumerable in all Italy," Athenagoras might also have said they were equally abundant throughout the peninsula of Greece and the Ionian Isles. The writers we refer to find tablets of stone in all these countries, some of them, excusably enough, engraved with words often wrongly spelled, sometimes in words suggestive of the prevailing lingo, perhaps even slang language which slaves and their descendants, the freedmen, almost always without education, would naturally make use of, which is of itself exceedingly interesting, bringing the working people of ancient Rome, Greece and Asia freshly down to us, as it were, in their work clothes, their tools in hand, and their careless vernacular exactly as used in every day life.

In announcing our remarks on the ancient Sepulcralia or burial societies, we cannot do better than refer to the popular scientific research on the origin of the plebians, by Prof. Fustel de Coulanges. This author, while not appearing to understand that they might have been partly derived from the outcasts of the patrician family, relegated by the paterfamilias into slavery, admits fully as much.²⁶ Every student of the facts recognizes that the ²³ Muratorius, Antiquitates Italicae, Medii Aevi, 6 vols. Milan, 1,744.

²⁴ Rose, Inscriptiones Graecae Vetustissimae.

²⁵ Böckh, Corpus Inscriptionum Graecarum, 3 vols. Berlin, 1853, folio.

²⁶ "Nous sommes pourtant frappé de voir dans Tite-Live, qui connaissait les vieilles traditions, que les patriciens reprochaient aux plébéiens non pas d'être issus des populations vaincues, mais de manquer de religion et même de famille."

great plebeian class of the ancient population was originally derived from the outcasts of the family and that they were, as a religio-political consequence, without a religion, without a home, without even a recognition or count among the citizen population²⁷ and without marriage rites. They were consequently all illegitimates.²⁸ These are stupendous facts, little understood by people of this day.

These were great grievances which they had to bear. They built up among themselves a religion of their own, had secret organizations and burial societies which often served as a shield to their trade unions, from the law.²⁹ They were regarded by Cicero as wild beasts;³⁰ and he invariably speaks of the organized proletaries with scathing contempt. Just after the death of Spartacus, while the senate was endeavoring to pass a law for the suppression of labor organizations, Claudius Pulcher, who to "curry favor with the plebeians,"³¹ changed his name to Clodius, and boldly came to the front in defense of the labor unions. In spite of all the efforts of Cicero against him Clodius actually succeeded not only in preventing the passage of restrictive laws against the trade and other organizations, but secured the enactment of several others, greatly favoring the proletaries who had been covertly using their secret burial societies and mutual aid communes as organizations of resistance. Cicero was greatly

Or, ce reproche qui était déjà immérité au temps de Licinius Stolon et que les contemporains de Tite-Live, comprenaient à peine, devait remonter à une époque très ancienne et nous reporte aux premiers temps de la cité." (Fustel de Coulanges, Cité Antique, p. 278).

²⁷ La Cité Antique, p. 322: "Les hommes de la classe inférieure formèrent entre eux un corps," and again p. 278: "Le peuple comprenait les patriciens et leurs clients; la plèbe était en dehors."

²⁸ Idem, p. 278-9: "C'était renoncer à une religion. Ajoutons encore que le fils né d'un mariage sans rites, était réputé bâtard, comme celui qui était né de l'adultère, et la religion domestique n'existait pas pour eux." So with the ancients religion and citizenship were one and the same thing.

²⁹ Mommsen, De Collegiis et Sodalibus Romanorum, p. 4. "Tanta vero fuit sodalitatis religio, ut publicis etiam legibus sodales prohiberentur, quominus eam læderent."

³⁰ "Vera quædam sodalitas et plane pastoritia atque agrestis Germanorum lupercorum: quorum coitio illa sylvestris ante est instituta, quam humanitas atque leges." Cicero, Pro Marco Coelio, 11.

³¹ See American Encyclopædia, Article Clodius. Were it not that this article was written in the same spirit of aristocratic bias of patrician history, it would have to be pronounced by the student of sociology as scurrilous. The truth is, Clodius was at heart, a noble, wise and exceedingly able tribune. He was one of those in the army of Lucullus, who took part in the suppression of Spartacus. After his overthrow 6,000 of the proletaries were brutally crucified on the Appian way lining that avenue for miles with this horrid spectacle. From that time Clodius was the staunch lawyer of organized labor.

incensed at this.²² It is clear that Cicero, who was intensely aristocratic, drew down upon him, in his prodigious defense of the gentes and the correspondingly aggravating raillery against the organized workers, the hatred and revenge of the laboring element of Rome, who, driven to straits, took up the political issue and even took up arms. These studies are exceedingly interesting, inasmuch as they reveal to us that Rome at that time—less than 100 years before Christ, was very populous, that much the larger share of her population consisted of the proletaries both slaves and freedmen, and that the freedmen and some of the slaves were organized; and finally that this organization, whether in shape of burial or of trade unions, was the cause of political contention, which grew rapidly into vast commotions and a civil duel between the gentiles and the proletaries. Cicero, the mortal foe of the latter, was constantly inveighing against them²³ until his death. In fact, it will be easily shown that the great orator came to his death directly in consequence of his bitter complicity in these labor convulsions, always taking sides against them.

A curious fact is observed, in looking over Orelli and Gruter's list of inscriptions of the burial societies, showing that among the poorest the practice of cremation was common. The order had niches or recesses attached to the grounds frequented by them for their meetings; and being too poor, in fact disallowed the noble rite of burial and its attendant family worship, they were obliged to burn the bodies of the deceased and preserve their ashes in pots called ollæ cinerariæ.²⁴ The poor fellows, having no religion of their own, denied that honor by the privileged classes who lived upon their labor, and often being of the same original stock and consequently of religious tendency, were in the habit of borrowing from the gens families some tutelary deity in whose name to worship. This, it appears, they had always maintained the right to do. When Christianity came a few years afterwards, with its new and absolutely democratic religion and its mutual co-operation more nearly fitted to their case, they embraced it in great numbers.

²² Cic., Pro Sexto. We render as follows: "This Clodius has chosen this name instead of Aurelius for his tribunal labors to curry favor with the organized slaves—men enlisted from the streets arranged in companies, cheered on by his moral stimulus to arms, to pillage."

²³ Mommsen says: "Compluribus locis Cicero invehitur in P. Clodium restitutis lege sua collegiis ann. 58 ante Christ. nova collegia ordinantem." (De Coll. et Sodal. Rom. p. 57.)

²⁴ Fig. Orelli, Inscr. No. 4,358 Sepulcralia, reads: "D. M. M. Herennius a plowman" and Herennia Lacena write on in their son's own handwriting. The pot containing the ashes stands on left side of the monument," etc., etc. So again Labi and Koner, Life of the Greeks and Romans, pp. 378-9, figs. 401, 402 and others with descriptions. These represent the celebrated Columbaria of which Gorius wrote an elaborate work, illustrated with engravings. Fig. 402 shows not only the niches in which stand to this day the cinerary urns, but also the urns themselves. One columbartum, the Vigna Codina, has 425 such niches in nine rows, p. 479. A small marble over each urn gives the name. These are the burial places (see p. 377) of the slaves and freedmen.

Mommsen mentions some regulations in the laws governing the burial societies; among others is one against suicide.³⁵ It was a law for preventing suicide by appealing to their pride in a decent burial; and prohibited any money being taken from the communal fund wherewith to defray the funeral expenses of the suicide.

After the passage of the conspiracy laws, B. C. 58, the unions continued to exercise their wonted habits in defiance of the laws of suppression. Two causes lie at the base of this fact; there were by this time wealthy business men in the organizations who controlled social and political influence, although themselves of plebeian stock. This is one cause. Another is, that the organizations, when they felt the knife of persecution, withdrew themselves from public view and became intensely secret. Where the organizations were for religious purposes they were not suppressed; but there was a special regulation fixing it so that they could simulate, or use religion as a cloak.³⁶ It is very unfortunate that the ancient laws of the Twelve Tables were not preserved so as to have come down to us as engraved. They are known to have been placed in the most conspicuous part of the Roman forum. It was the oldest of the three written systems of Roman Law³⁷ having been established B. C. 452. It is, moreover, now supposed to have been almost identical with the Greek law; the provisions, so far as the labor communes are concerned, being alike for the Greeks and Romans. It appeared to Gaius to be a translation, and seems to have been the identical law of Solon who is known to have given the free right of organization to the proletaries of Athens.³⁸ Our opinion is that these Tables of laws favoring the laboring classes, had become so obnoxious to the Roman gentes that they determined to rid the forum of its presence, thus virtually annulling the laws.

³⁵ Item placuit, quisquis ex quacumque causa mortem sibi adsciverit, ejus ratio funeris non habebitur." (De Coll. and Sodal. Rom. p. 100.)

³⁶ Mommsen, Idem, p. 87: "Ipsa illa simulata religio senatum promovit ut jus coeundi tollerat." The clause of the law appears to except or exempt those aged associations known to be beyond suspicion: "Sub prætextu religionis vel sub specie solvendi voti coetus illicitos nec a veteranis tentari oportet." (Lex 2. Dig. de extr. crim. xvii, li.

³⁷ Mackenzie, Roman Laws, p. 5-7.

Large numbers of burial associations existed and it is repeatedly acknowledged that they often acted as a shield to the real trade unions under the garb of religion, notwithstanding the law. Mommsen describes a burial society at Alburnum in Lucania the notice of which was found inscribed on a libellus with some words spelled wrongly: "Artimidorus Apollonii, magister collegii Iovis Cernani et Valerius Niconis et Ofas Menofili, quæstores collegii ejusdem, posito hoc libello publice testantur." Then follow the laws of the society prescribing the use of the common fund. Mommsen, however remarks:³⁹ "It is clear that this mutual relief society of Cernanus, although bearing or holding up the name of a god, was nevertheless instituted, in order to give the funeral benefit, collected within a certain time and under the law, to the heirs of the deceased." This means that under the semblance of the burial society, they substantially met as a mutual aid commune—perhaps a trade organization. Again, aside from the opinion of Mommsen, always reliable, we have Asconius for positive testimony that frequently the sacred societies, of which the burial societies were a part, were suppressed on suspicion that they were discovered by the police to be engaged in carrying out the business of those trade or other organizations on which the conspiracy law had laid its hand.⁴⁰

³⁸ Cf. Granier, Histoire des Classes Ouvrières, p. 325. "Nous avons fait voir d'ailleurs que la loi romaine des Douze-Tables sur les corporations contenait les mêmes dispositions que la loi grecque, à ce point qu'elles ont paru à Gaius être la traduction l'une de l'autre." The words of Gaius (vide Digest, lib. XLVII, tit. xxii. leg. 4. will be found quoted in our note 87, page 127. On page 290, note 1, Granier speaks of the intimate relations between Athenian and Roman trade unions as follows: "Du reste, si le texte de Plutarque pouvait laisser quelque doute sur le fait des jurandes athéniennes, un fragment de Gaius sur les Douze Tables, conservé par le Digeste, dit que la loi sur les corps des métiers paraît avoir été empruntée aux lois de Solon sur la même matière; et là-dessus Gaius cite le texte même de la loi de Solon, dans lequel il est statué que les membres des métiers peuvent s'ériger eux-mêmes en corporations en respectant les lois de l'État."

³⁹ Mommsen, De Collegiis et Sedaliciis Romanorum, p. 94.

⁴⁰ "Frequenter tum etiam cœtus factiosorum hominum, sine publica auctoritate, malo publico fiebant . . . propter quod postea collegia sancta et pluribus legibus, sunt sublata." (Ascon. in Cornel. p. 75.)

By far the most numerous and powerful of the organizations of proletaries or outcasts among the ancients were the genuine trade unions.⁴¹ Had it not been for the ancient habit, probably established by the lost law of the Twelve Tables, of inscribing "more or less of the objects, dates, names of leaders or organizers, and name of the tutelary deity under which they chose to worship—being proscribed from the privilege of worship of their own—we should be altogether without data regarding the vast trade societies which from immemorial times existed in Greece and Rome and in the provinces over which those nations ruled. We have sufficiently explained the causes of this organization. It may be well, however to sum them up in this manner:

First in ancient times all lands not belonging to the gens estates but achieved by conquest, were common property of the state. The people relied upon the products of these lands for their subsistence. This was true of people of all ranks, whether the haughty gentes or the degraded slaves. Many subsisted upon the fruits of the common lands. King Numa, admitting this, was wise enough to create, or rather recognize an already existing system of trade or business-unions, the special function of which was to till the lands and divide and distribute the products. Nothing could be more sensible and nothing more practical than to give the soil-tillers their organizations under protection of the state—and this means under a species of subvention or common guarantee. It must not be forgotten that by a law of ancient religion there were two distinct classes—workers and non-workers or the privileged and the non-privileged classes. They were so distinct that Dionysius of Halicarnassus declares that the latter were not even counted with the people or enumerated in the census as human beings; a fact which has caused much astonishment to the writers on ancient populousness; some counting them in and some not; thus producing figures so ridiculously at variance and contradictory that nobody pretends except approximately, even to conjecture what the ancient population was!⁴²

⁴¹ The more numerous slaves are here excepted.

⁴² We are, as yet, without the words of the law rendering it binding upon the communes to set up and inscribe a marble, or other stone slab. It was probably lost with the Twelve Tables. Also the similar law of Solon.

⁴³ Cf. Wallace on the "Numbers of Mankind." Ednburg. 1753, p. 287

Thus for many centuries, the lands of the ancient Romans, called ager publicus was common or public property, tilled by the proletaries, many of whom were organized into unions legalized by the arrangements of the Twelve Tables which was merely a literal ratification of the plan of Numa Pompilius, dividing the workers into nine species of craft and allowing each the autonomy of an organization. This shifted from the shoulders of the state or land-owner the care and responsibility of cultivation, while it elevated the proletaries to the practical dignity of that work. It was not the plan of small holdings by isolated families but of small holdings by isolated communes, which in turn, were amenable to, and under the general direction of the state, or common proprietor.

It cannot be said that this really great and wise system ever attained to a wide extent. The idea seems to have been clear to the workingmen and they carried it into force to some extent, but were always met with fierce opposition. The manner in which the state obtained its share of the proceeds or usufruct of these lands was by the Vectigalarii, the celebrated union of tax collectors who, instead of using money, took the tax "in kind;" which means that they went to the farmers, agricolæ, after the harvests and with wagons, brought to the Municipium or town in whichever district they were stationed, the share of the proceeds of the common land due the city people—grain, wool, fruits, pease, beans and whatever the land produced. The grain thus collected was turned over to the organization of the united pistores or millers, to be ground; thence to the united bakers, panifices to be made into bread. So with regard to everything. The almost phenomenal simplicity and universality of this great plan of the ancients is accounted for only by the fact that there were two classes so widely separated that the very touch of a proletary was supposed to pollute. In consequence of this wide distinction the merchant, who was also a workman, could not become a monopolist because he was obliged to be a unionist which naturally recognized him at a par with his peers. This was a direct result of the crude communism which legalized trade unionism had created and upheld for many centuries not only at Rome but all over Italy and in many parts of Greece.

"Slaves who were of so little account under the ancient governments."—"Free citizens who alone had a voice in the public councils."

Very gradually however, some merchants succeeded in becoming rich.⁴⁴ On the other hand, as we prove in our sketch of Spartacus, the older slave system which still continued under the law of Lycurgus in Sparta, underwent a revival in Italy. By the plan of Numa Pompilius, which was the true ancient trade union system, there was no way for an aristocrat to conduct business of any kind without polluting himself by contract with the proletaries. He could, by owning the slaves, job them to managers of genius, themselves of the laboring class, some to a boss farmer, some to a miller, some to a wagoner, some to a manufacturer, and thus, without himself touching his own property, gratify his desire of profit, indirectly, through the labor of his slaves. We are told that Crassus bought up as great a number as 500 slaves at a time; that Nicias owned 1,000; that Claudius owned as many as 4,116 and Athens owned and hired out no less than 100,000 slaves!⁴⁵ But these things did not occur in Italy until the decline through Roman hostility, of the seven centuries of trade unionism, which began in high antiquity, and which had been acknowledged and incorporated as an industrial system of the state under Numa, nearly 700 years before Christ, and did not give up its foothold without one of the most terrible and protected agrarian and servile struggles recorded or unrecorded in the vicissitudes of the world. Nor must the remark be forgotten that during all the centuries through which this trade unionism existed the golden era of prosperity and general happiness was at its highest so far as labor was concerned.

But this prosperity and happiness will be better understood as we enumerate, one by one, the links of trade unions which formed the great chain of industrial weal. While we are doing this it may be well to keep constantly in mind the suggestion, together with its proofs, that labor organization for protection, co-operation, resistance and mutual improvement is always the best standard by which to measure the intensity of true civilization. When the law forbidding these organizations struck the proletaries, one-half a century before Christ, their decline began; and this decline was a powerful cause of the fall of the Roman empire.

⁴⁴ Consult Drumann, Arbeiter und Communisten in Griechenland und Rom, p. 31: "Es verminderte die geringschätzung nicht mit welcher man auf die Arbeiter sah, dass mehrere berühmte Männer durch ihre Geburt oder durch ihre frühere Beschäftigung diesem Stande angehörten."

⁴⁵ For these statistics, see Bücher, S. 35-9. Schambach, Italische Sklavenaufstand, S. 1-3. Siefert, Sicilische Sklavenkriege, S. 10-15.

The old system of abject slavery pre-existing in the higher antiquity, gradually reappeared with the great Roman Conquests and usurped the foundations of the happier unions with its malignant concomitants of degraded labor under the lash of an overseer on the one hand, and with its millionaire politicians, schemers and voluptuaries on the other. Corruption followed. Hope fled with liberty. Thrift disintegrated into pestilential reservoirs of vice. Rome fell into a mass of corruption.

It is not at all strange, nor to be wondered at that the poor who constituted the laboring class, should keenly feel their degrading exclusion from the Eleusinian Mysteries. Nor is it at all to be wondered at if we find Plutarch reciting to us his account of what must have been a gigantic uprising of these people 1,180 years before Christ, under Menestheus, as under Aristonicus in Asia Minor, 1,047 years afterward they rose against similar social degradations. Heaven to those poor people was a boon much nearer and more visible than at the present day. They imagined the earth to be flat. On this side all were mortal; on the other immortal. Some of the immortal happy had power to come from the other side to this. Here from Mount Olympus they assumed charge of the welfare of mortals. Many believed the flat earth so thin that rivers meandered from one to the other. Between the two surfaces there were surging floods of horrid smoke and steaming, lurid waters or pits of fiery asphaltum for the wicked, as well as bright, purling streams sparkling and cool for the just, leaving the banks and plains that were covered with verdure and peopled with enchanting birds and game.

Let the mover of the modern labor agitation who treats with scorn the author who mixes religion with a history of the ancient, reconsider. He must go back to them as they really were, poor down-trodden, superstitious, credulous and ignorant of facts while misled by priests. They believed heaven was so near by lineal measure that they often imagined they could hear the melodious voices of the blessed on the other sides; yet while they had nothing on this side to live for and their grasping imagination overheard and dwelt upon a future world beyond this "vale of tears," they found themselves shut out from all hope. The workman in the modern field of labor agitation certainly has but a gloomy foretaste in anything further than his future natural life. His predecessors have gone before with the axe and sickle of reason and past experience, tools of the thus intellectual pioneer. Their incomputable toil has, with investigation and experiment, with repeated millions of practical works, cleared away the mythic film of priestcraft and superstitious belief. The earth is now a globe. The miner knows this; for the deeper he descends the more unendurable the heat. Who wants now to descend to heaven? Who wishes to go to the other side, to China—a race groveling, mortal and inferior, rather than that of the ancients, beautiful seraphic, melodious, immortal. Who now wants to visit the ouranus of old Plato in the vaulted dome of heaven? Who wants to rise when everybody knows that instead of a region of the immortal happy the farther one mounts the more uninhabitable, more frigid more stifling the ethers of space? Labor's own skillful hand has caused all this metamorphosis in the human mind and forced it and is still forcing it out of its ignorant soarings and credence-ravings down to a cognizance of the earthly things that are.

No, we must picture the life of the ancient lowly as it really was in all its cushioned imagination, in all its yearnings to get there by the beautiful river, its green carpets on the other side where the wicked ceased from troubling and the weary were at rest; and those otherwise incomprehensible, religio-practical associations can be understood and their full function appreciated only by our throwing off our own prejudice and contemplating them as they really were. This we propose to do.

L. CEIONIO. COMMODO. SEX.
VETULENO. CIVICA. POMPE-IANO. COS. A. D. V. IDUS. IUN.

Lanuvi in Municipio in Templo Antinoi in Quo L. Caesennius Rufus
In the temple of Antinoë, city of Lavinia, where L. Cæsennius Rufus.

Dict. III. et patronus Municipi conventum haberi jusserrat Spokesman and guardian of the town, ordered an association formed, through per. L. Pompeium

L. Pompey

F um, QQ. Cultorom Dianae, et Antinoi, Poland F under tutelary care of Diana and Antinoë, promising to con-licitus est se tribute towards it in annum daturum eis ex liberalitate sua Hs. Xv. M. N. usum out of his purse within a given year a sum of $600 for use of the union.

Die natalis Dianae Idib. Aug. Hs. CCCC. N. et die natalis An-
On Diana's birthday, the Ides of August, and birthday of Antinoë, $16 more.
tinoi V. K.

Decemb. Hs. OCCC. N. Et præcepit legem ab ipsis con-
In the month of December, $16. He also prescribes a law regulating the stitutam sub tetrathe union which is stilo Antinoi parte interiori perscribi in verba infra scripta.

written on the inside of the 4 columned pillar in words as recorded below:

M. Antonio Hiberno P. Mummio Sisenna Cos. K. Ian. Collegium
During the consulship of M. Antonius Hiberus and P. Mummius Sisenna the Salutare Dianae

Et Antinoi constitutum, L. Caesennio L. F. Quir. mutual benefit society of Diana and Antinoë was organized by Rufo Dict. III. IDEMQ. PATR.

L. Cæsennius Rufus, its recognized patron.

KAPUT

Designation.

EX. S. C. P. R.

Written by order of the Præfect.

Quibus coire convenire collegiumque habere liceat. Qui stipem
It is permitted that all wishing to organize themselves, may do so.

menstruum conferre volent in Funera II in collegium coeant neq.
Any one desiring to pay monthly dues of 8 cents to the Funeral fund may sub specie eius collegi nisi semel in mense coeant conferendi causa, atten. the meetings twice a month if the subjects of such meetings be the unde defuncti sepeliantur burying of the dead.

Quod faustum felix salutareq. sit imp. Caesari Traiano Hadriano
Whatever is favorable, happy and healthful for the emperors, Trojan, Adrian

Aug. totiusque and the whole house of the Cæsars, domus August. nostris collegioq. nostro; et bene adque in-will also be good for us and our society; and we should perform well and dustrie contraxerimus, ut industriously our duty that we may exitus eorum honeste prosequamur. Itaq. bene conferendo honestly reach the end. So ought we universally to agree, that we may universi consentire grow old in union.

debemus, ut longo tempore inveterescere possimus.

Tu qui novos in hoc collegio intrare voles, prius legem perlege et sic O thou who wouldst bring initiates into this union, read well these rules, that intra, ne postmodum queraris aut controversiam relinquo.

thou leavest no controversy with thy heirs!

LEX COLLEGI.

Law of the Union.

Placuit universis, ut quisquis in hoc collegium intrare voluerit, Be it ordered in presence of all men: That whosoever may desire to join this dabit kapitulari nomine.

union shall give to the Secretary-Treasurer

HS. C. N. et vini boni amphoram; item in menses sing. A.
his address, an initiation fee of $4, and a flagon of good wine; and like-

V. Item placuit, ut quisquis mensib.
wise 4 cents monthly dues. It is ordered that continenter non pariaverit et ei humanitus acciderit, eius ra-whoever fails to settle dues continuously for months, remaining a member tio funeris non habebitur, by grace, will not have the right of burial, even etiam si testamentum factum habuerit.

though he may have willed to the association his property.

Item placuit quisquis ex hoc corpore N. pariatum eum decesserit
Be it ordered that whoever dies, not in arrears to the order let his $4, be re-sequentur ex arca HS. CCCC. N. ex qua summa decedent turned from the treasury as expenses of burial.

exequiari nomine HS. I. N. qui ad Rogus dividuntur. Exe-One sesterce shall be divided at the funeral pile. But the ceremony must quæ autem pedibus fungentur.

be performed on foot.

Item placuit, quisquis a municipio ultra miliar. XX. decesserit Be it ordered, that whenever a member dies at a distance of 20 miles from the et nuntiatum fuerit, eo exire debebunt electi ex corpore N.

city, it shall be reported, a permit taken and 2, elected from among the homines tres, qui funeris ejus curam agant et rationem po-members, be sent to see to it. Should it be found that there was any depulo reddere debebunt, sine dolo malo. Si quit in eis fraudis ception, then as much as four-fold the amount shall be exacted as a fine, Causa, inventum fuerit, eis multa esto quadruplum.

by reason of such injustice.

Quibus sing. nummus dabitur; hoc amplius viatici nomine cito
Those to whom money is given, are to receive it as follows: If it be more sing. HS. XX. N. quod longius quam intra mill. XX. de-than the 20 miles, the sum shall be for each, 20 sesterces. But if the cesserit et nuntiari non potuerit, tum is qui eum funeraverit member dies at a greater distance than 20 miles, and it cannot be antestato tabulis signati sigillis civium Romanorum VII. et nounced, then, whoever attends to the funeral must send an account, probata causa, funeraticium ejus; satio dato ab eis neminem signed and bearing the seal of 7 Roman citizens; and when the case petiturum, deductis commodis et exequiario, e lege collegiⁱ has been proved, and the funeral expenses found reasonable, no one dari sibi petat.

objecting, his pay shall be disbursed from the treasury if he asks it.

A nostro collegio dolus malus abesto neque patrono neque patro-Let there be no pain felt in our union. Neither patron nor patroness masnæ, neque domino neque dominæ neque creditori ex hoc colter nor mistress, nor even creditor, shall make any demand, account legio ulla petitio esto nisi qui testamento heres nominatus est.

or claim whatever, or anybody else, except him who is elected heir.

Si quis intestatus decesserit, is, arbitrio quinq. et populi funerab
If any one die without children, five sesterces shall be given & all attend.

Item placuit, quisquis ex hoc collegio servus defunctus fuerit, et Be it ordered that whoever dies a member, being a slave, and his body is corpus ejus a domino dominave inquietate sepulturæ datum unwillingly given up for sepulture by master or mistress who will not non fuerit neque tabella, ei funus imaginarium fiet.

permit a registration, an imaginary funeral shall be held.

Item placuit, quisquis ex quacumque causa mortem sibi adsciverit,
Be it ordered that whoever commits suicide from any cause, for this reason ejus ratio funeris non habebitur.

no funeral can be held.

Item placuit, ut quisquis servus ex hoc collegio liber factus fuerit
 Be it ordered that whatever slave is set free by this union, he shall contribis dare debebit vini boni amphoram.

 ute a flagon of good wine.

Item placuit, quisquis magister suo anno erit ex ordine albi ad
 It is ordered that whatever manager who during his year, shall not attend the cænam faciendam, et non observaverit neque fecerit, is arcæ ceremony nor observe, nor perform functions, shall pay a fine of 30 sesinferet HS. XXX. N. et insequens ejus dare debebit et is terces into the treasury and the place shall be forfeited to his suc-ejus loco restituere debebit.

 cessor.

ORDO CENARUM VIII. ID MAR.

Order of the feasts, on the 8th., Ides of March :

NATALI GÆSENNI PATRIS V. K. DEO.

NAT. ANTONOI IDIB. AUG NATALI DIANÆ ET COL-

LEGII XIII K. SEPT. JAN. NATALI L. GÆSENNI

RUFII PATR. MUNIO.

Magistri cænarum ex ordine albi facta quo ordine homines qua-
 The managers of the feasts established by the order, will place the men, 4 at a terni ponere debebunt: vini boni amphoras singulas, et time, in their order: each contributing a flask of good wine and a loaf of panes A. Ii qui numerus collegi fuerit et sardas numero best bread, and each, four pickled sardines served hot in proper quatuor strationem caldam cum ministerio.

 dishes.

Item placuit, ut quisquis quinquennalis in hoc collegio factus fuerit, a sigillis eius temporis, quo quinquennalis erit, immunis esse debebit, et ei ex omnibus divisonibus partes duplas dari. Item scribae et viatori a sigillis vacantibus partes ex omni divisione sesquiplas dari placuit.

Item placuit, ut quisquis quinquennalitatem gesserit integre, et ob honorem partes sesquiplas ex omni re dari, ut et reliqui recte faciendo idem sperent.

Item placuit, si quis quid queri aut referre volet, in conventu referant, ut quieti et hilares diebus sollemnibus epulemr.

Item placuit, ut quisquis seditionis causa de loco in alium locum transierit, ei multa esto HS. IIIL. N. Si quis autem in obprobrium alteralterius dixerit, aut tumultuatus fuerit, ei multa esto HS. N. Si quis quinquennali inter epulas obprobrium aut quid contumeliose dixerit, ei multa esto HS. XX. N.

Item placuit, ut quinquennalis sui cuiusque temporis diebus sollemnibus ture et vino supplicet et ceteris officiis albatus fungatur, et diebus natalium Dianae et Antinoi oleum collegio in balineo publico ponat antequam epulentur.

The remarkable features of this college are that under the guise of piety, and of being a burial and mutual benefit society, it was used to emancipate slaves. That it was a trade or labor union is shown by its being devoted to securing good places to work.

Everywhere the severity of the law is apparent. Rome had a mortal fear of labor riots and uprisings and hence the many fines which stood as a constant menace, acting as a check against insubordination. It was difficult to obtain a privilege or charter to organize one of these labor unions, and consequently where they possessed one, it was prized as a gem of great value; which may account for their great age, found in some cases to have been four or five hundred years.

The love of the Latin race for pleasures is observable all through. They used this great union or commune for that purpose; but they are seen in these rules and regulations, to have held uppermost a peculiar system of culture tending toward ultimate emancipation from the lowly and restricted condition in which they were held by the law and the police regulations of the optimate class.

CHAPTER XIV.

THE CATEGORIES.

THE GREAT ECONOMIC ORGANIZATIONS.

ANCIENT FEDERATIONS of Labor—How they were Employed by the Government—Nomenclature of the Brotherhoods—Categories of King Numa—Varieties and Ramifications—The Masons, Stonecutters and Bricklayers—Federation for Mutual Advantages—List of the 35 Trade Unions, under the Jus Coeundi.

NUMA POMPILIUS, the first king after Romulus, recognized trade unions even before Solon of Athens, who followed rather than led in this scheme as a measure of political economy.¹ They had, however, already existed, perhaps thousands of years before receiving any recognition at all. One of the first of importance legalized by these lawgivers was the fraternity of builders.

They were called in Greek, the technicai and in Latin tignarii. It is evident from Plutarch, that he intended this word to include also the mason.² If, however, all the building trades were organized into one body or union, they were very different from trade unions of our day. Besides, had Plutarch intended to convey the idea that all the building trades were united into one under Numa he would, it seems to us, have used the still more comprehensive Greek term technites which expresses it. Again its Latin synonym found by Mommsen, proves that Numa's union was that of workers in metal and wood.³ In those times the mountains back of Rome produced dense forests, which were not swept away by machinery with the rapidity of modern art. The people, on account of wars, want of medical science, comparative abstinence from marriage, dissoluteness of the rich, hardships of the poor, did not multiply rapidly. In consequence the forests produced new trees as fast as they were cut away by the workmen. Rome was mostly built of wooden houses; and no doubt there was an abundance of work for the carpenters. All the great public buildings were constructed by trade unions for the state, direct—that is, with contractors or middlemen, and the carpenters' union used to take charge of the woodwork. The *Ager publicus*⁴ had to be furnished with houses for the Gentry. Honorary seats were made by these fabri tignariorum, such as the splendid *bisellia*⁵ or cushions of the gods. The fine villas of wealthy gentlemen⁶ who had a custom of turning public moneys and lands to their own account were work of their art. In fact this was common from the highest antiquity before the division of the gentes into curæ and tribes. Thus it was not considered a breach of political rule to divert the public funds, to a certain extent, to the building or repairing of their own fine residences; And this work was performed by the builders' unions.

¹ Plutarch, Numa 1. Numa followed Romulus to the throne, about 690 years before Christ. Plutarch's suggestion that he might have personally known Pythagoras and that he had been brought up among the Pythagorean Greek settlements of Italy which were communistical in character looks exceedingly plausible.

² See Wm. Langhorne's tr. of Plutarch, in Numa.

There were two names under which the wood-workers of the building trades were known. These were the dendrophori, mentioned in the code of 'Theodosius' as

³ Mommsen, De Collegiis et Sodaliciis Romanorum, pp. 29-30. "Inter classes primam et secundam interjectæ erant centuria fabrum tignariorum et centuria fabrum ærariorum, sive, ut Dionysium (VII. 59) sequamur: δύο λόχοι τεκτόνων καὶ χαλκοτύπων καὶ ὅσοι ἄλλοι πολεμικῶν ἐργῶν ἦσαν χειροτέχναι.

⁴ We prefer to use this Latin term because it saves explanatory words necessary to qualify the meaning of the English word "land." It means common lands belonging to the government, on which the workingmen had no claim as citizens. The propensity of the Roman building trades to organize in protective societies is richly illustrated in an article written by Mr. Rogers and forming a chapter in a large work on labor edited by Mr. Geo. E. McNeill, Bost. 1887, entitled "The Building Trades," Mr. Rogers, (pp. 335-7), shows that this proclivity of the ancient Romans for organizing into communes was never lost even in far off Kent, sticking to the English people to this day, furnishes a formidable argument against the assumption that the Saxon Rule absolutely superseded that of the earlier inhabitants.

⁵ Fabretti, Inscriptiones Antiquæ Explicatio, p. 170, 324, p. 227, 604. Grut. 675, 8. Also Orell, No. 4,055.

⁶ Our own word "gentleman" is directly derived from the Latin word gens, or high and respectable family. If we call the human race an "Order," the gentes may be considered a "genus."

⁷ Codex Theodosii, 14, 8. Also Orell, Inscriptiones Latinarum Collectio, Nos.

veritable trade unions, and the tignarii who were the true carpenters and joiners. As we construe the signification of these two terms from the stone monuments and slabs on which they are found engraved and not as found in the dictionaries, we conclude that the dendrophori must have been the heavy lumbermen and framers. They cut and hewed the heavy timbers both for buildings and ships; while the tignarii did the lighter work. One thing is certain; they both occur together in many of the inscriptions.* This class of trade unions was considered necessary to the welfare of the state; and was exempted from being suppressed when, in B. C. 58, the conspiracy laws were put in operation by Cæsar; although so much suspicion rested upon them that they were watched with a jealous eye by the officers of the law and as appears, much of their former vitality was crushed out. They had existed from the time of Numa in Rome, and of Solon at Athens, in full strength and vigor. At the time of their suppression by restrictive laws nearly all the Grecian territory, especially that of Attica, including Athens, the Piræus, Eleusis and all the populous towns where they are known to have existed in great numbers, belonged to Rome, then mistress of the world.

It must have been a very strange experience for a great people to undergo. Here was a system of manufacture and repairs of immemorable age, authorized by the most highly esteemed lawgivers, one of whom was one of the seven wise men of Greece. It had been known by the chronicles for fully 600 years, and, though it performed duties which by the haughty and foolish were considered degrading, and upon which there rested a taint, yet it was an important institution, taking charge of indispensable affairs of public as well as of private life. All at once it was suppressed. That the result was a dangerous convulsion cannot be wondered at.

Gruter cites a college of dendrophori† who used to build

3,741, 4,082, 3,349, 7,336, 7,145, 3,888, 5,113, 4,055, 6,037, 7,018, 7,018, 6,031, 6,073, 6,590, 911, 4,109, 7,194, 7,197, 4,069. Each of these 19 numbers, represents a collegium or trade union of wood-workers. The inscriptions were found in as many places nearly as there are numbers.

* Orell. 4,084, "Collegium Fabrorum Navalium Tunc ea ipsa conditione fabr. Tig. Pisauensium." Pisaurum was an Umbrian town at the mouth of the navigable Pisaurus, Inscr. 4,160 Faber Tignariorum and Coll. Dendrophorum are noted together.

† Gruterius, Inscriptiones Antiquæ Totius Orbis Romanorum, 175, 8.

houses and ships or boats for the society of freight boatmen located at Rome. He also gives one which Orelli quotes, taken on a stone slab in times as late as Justinian.¹⁰ The word epulantur conveying the idea of entertainment, shows that these schools of the workingmen sometimes used their organization as a means of mutual enjoyment. Especially was this the case among the Greek fraternities which we describe in their place. After the great struggle with Spartacus, the right of organization was severely restricted by the Roman law; and it became necessary for the unions, in order to exist at all, to assume two forms of dissimulation by which to parry the attacks of enemies who had recourse to these conspiracy laws in order to gratify their whims of revenge, or to fortify their own schemes of making money through the cheap labor of the slave system which Rome in the later days had revived, and which such enemies of organized labor as Cicero or Crassus, were pushing with an almost fierce determination, on pretense of restoring the ancient purity of religion, family and vested rights. We have noted that certain kinds of organizations were permitted.¹¹ Among these were collegia sancta, or those unions and fraternities given to holy or pious purposes. So some of these were shrewd enough to combine business with holiness and thus shield themselves from their pursuers.¹² Mommsen speaks of them in clearest terms which leave no doubt whatever regarding the mysterious procedure¹³ of those old Roman lawyers who were determined to suppress the trade unions, root and branch, in order to reinstitute slavery, the most ancient form of labor known to their religion, which had

¹⁰ We quote the Latin as given by Orelli, No. 4,088. "Ex S. C. Schola Aug. Collegii Fabrorum Tignariorum impendiis ipsorum ab inchoato exstructo, solo dato ab T. Furio primogenio qui et dedic. ejus HS. X. N. ded. ex cujus summa. reddit, omnibus annis XII. K. August die natalis sui, epulantur." Gruter, 169, 6

¹¹ Dion. XXXVIII. 18, Antiquitates, says: "Τα ἱερὰ καὶ ἱερὰ . . . ὄντα μὲν ἐκ τοῦ ἀρχαίου καταλυθέντα δὲ χρόνον τινά." Asconius l. C. Comment, says: "Collegia sunt sublata præter pauca atque certa quæ utilitas civitatis desiderassit quæ sint fabrorum actorumque." These saved were Pagan image makers who wrought the religious devices, q. v.

¹² Complures autem ob huiusmodi instituebantur collegia: religionis ante omnia causa, ut, qui idem vitæ genus essent amplexi, hisdem quoque sacris uterentur," etc., etc. Orell. VII. p. 244. Inscr. Latin Collectio.

¹³ Mommsen, De Coll. et Sodal. Rom., pp. 87-88, says: "Ipsa illa simulata (referring to lex. 3, Digest, de extr. crim. XLVII, 11.) religio senatum promovit tu jus coeundi tolleret. Explicanda sunt illa verba de colitionibus in templis ad rem divinam faciendam, quæ etsi neutiquam contra Sctum erant, facile tamen in fraudem Scti usurpari poterant."

founded their patrimony, their law of entailment through primogeniture and their system of grandees and of slaves. Numa and Solon had been these fellows' enemies; Lycurgus their friend. Trade unionism the child of wills and manumissions, had first come among them, a spontaneous growth. It cradled and matured human sympathy. It had proved itself innocent, enterprising and good. It had succeeded in becoming legalized by those two powerful princes—a mighty stride. But it had, as the gens families fancied, usurped the ancient and holy system of slavery and thus interfered—by substituting communism—with their vested individual rights.¹⁴ On account, probably, of their superstition, Cicero, Cæsar and the rest, after they had put down Clodius the intrepid orator and tribune who had restored the old and created new,¹⁵ excepted such of the carpenters and joiners or cabinet-makers' unions as confined their labor to manufacturing all sorts of wooden idols, which in those days, were sometimes very large, and built for the temples, the fanes and the family alters. It is also quite likely that a few unions devoted to the carpenter work on the temples and the aedes sanctae, were saved. But we ascend from these cruel days of moribund Rome to an earlier and brighter age.

¹⁴ We have repeatedly mentioned the impossibility, among the Indo-European Greeks and Italians, of there ever having existed in those peninsulas a communistic, or even patriarchal form of government. The bent of labor communes was towards it but they never succeeded in breaking down the power of the competitive system; and it rules to this day. The oldest records of any kind shedding light, confirm the idea that originally the despotic form of government prevailed; the father paterfamilias, as king, with his sons and daughters and others as slaves around his fixed abiding place, must have been the primitive government behind which there is neither record nor philosophy—no philosophy without overturning the theory of development. Man has grown into refinement through reason and experience and it is altogether inconsistent with reason to suppose that he ever tried so high a form of government as the communistic one, or that he ever had in those times other than selfish, cruel, beast-government in which all research into antiquity finds him. Mommsen, History of Rome, Vol I, p. 44, in corroboration says: "But there can be no doubt that, with the Graeco-Italians as with all other nations, agriculture became, and in the mind of the people remained the germ and core of their national and of their private life. The house and the fixed hearth, which the husbandman constructs instead of the light hut and shifting fireplace of the shepherd, and represented in the spiritual domain and idealized in the goddess Vesta or Ἑστία, almost the only divinity not Indo-Germanic yet from the first common to both nations." So again (p. 48). "The Hellenic character, which sacrificed the whole to its individual elements, the nation to the township and the township to the citizen." This exactly expresses our idea, viz: that everything from the first, was subordinate to the unlimited, despotic control of the "father." For valuable information. See Funck Brentano La Civilisation et ses Lois, IV, I, p. 311, quoting Plutarch Numa, VII). "Il en fut de même dans les cités de la Grèce; ce fut une condition de leur progrès."

¹⁵ Ascon, Ad h. L. "Diximus, L. Pisone et A. Gabieno consulibus P. Clodium tribunum plebis—tulisse—de collegiis restituendis, novisque instituendis, quæ aut ex servitiorum fœce constituta."

Fabretti gives us another union of carpenters and joiners whose inscription was found at Leprignani. It reads very plainly and shows that they had a federation of the trades.¹⁶ Another collegium fabrorum tignariorum or carpenters' trade union is reported by Muratori.¹⁷ The tablet was found at Ravelli in the province of Naples, showing that the unions of those days were not confined to Rome or any of the other large cities but were as frequent proportionately to population in any small town.

An inscription is reported by Gruter,¹⁸ bearing evidence of another interesting school, schola, of the bona fide carpenters' unions, found in the Tolentine temple of Catharina—religious, of course, and of a later date. Orelli¹⁹ quotes the learned Muratori of Modena as the authority if not the finder of an inscription which describes a collegium together with a sodalitium—another Roman name for trade union, in which the president or Magister, and the secretary are mentioned. It is a union of the skilled woodworkers. It was found in the town of Falaria, and appears to be very old. It is not unusual for the inscriptions engraved in the time of the emperors, to state an approximate of their date by noting the names of the consuls, or of the monarch who then occupied the throne. Unfortunately for the more ancient ones this is not so strictly done; probably owing more to the fact that, as the law at earlier dates fully protected them, they were not forced to inscribe the dates by little points or constructions such as characterized the laws after the restrictive acts were promulgated.

No less than eighteen of the genuine carpenters and joiners' unions are found in the work of Orelli.²⁰ As these working people used their unions as means whereby to parry off the many dangers that beset them on every hand, such as slavery, starvation, slurs of contempt and in later times conscription, we cannot too well understand how keenly alive they must have been to their welfare.

¹⁶ Fabretti, C. IV, 529, of Inscriptiones Antiquae Explicatio.

¹⁷ Muratorius, Thesaurus Veterum Inscriptionum, 521.

¹⁸ Gruter, Inscriptiones Antiquae Totius Orbis Romanorum, 169. 6.

¹⁹ Orelli, No. 4,056, Muratori, Thesaur. Vet. Inscr. 523. We give it with the abbreviations: "D. M. T. Sillio T. Lib. Prisco mag, colleg. Fabr. et q. mag. et q. sodal. fullonum Clavdiae lib. uxori ejus matri sodal. C. Tullon. T. Sillius Karus et Ti. Claudius Phillippus mag. et Q. Colleg. fabr. filii parentib. piissimis."

²⁰ Scholae Artificum et Opificum, Vol. II, pp. 227-240, and Artes et Opificia, idem, pp. 247-266, of Orelli's great work on the Latin Inscriptions.

On the other hand, the power of organization which kept them in a position to supply the orders given them by the state, was ever a great encouragement.

Among the many interesting monuments or schools of ancient trade unionism, where mutual love and care were taught and the noble element of sympathy was grafted upon the selfish, competitive body of irascible and acquisitive paganism which animated the Lycurgan rule at Sparta and the purely archaic slave code everywhere, are those to be found in the Order of masons, stonecutters and bricklayers. These with the painters, glaziers, roofers and plumbers, were indispensable to complete the building trades. They too, felt the necessity of organization, especially in the later time of Cæsar and the emperors, on account of the awful treatment of slaves by their ferocious masters. There existed no law by which the slave masters could be brought to account for savage acts of barbarity toward their slaves.

This distressing state of things was not²¹ relieved until the emperor Adrian withdrew the slaves from the domestic tribunals and transferred them to the tribunal of the magistrates; in other words gave them government protection. But this was 200 years after the war of Spartacus. The fear of being relegated back to slavery was a constant urgent to ancient trade unionism; and this explains one reason at least, why they so tenaciously hugged their fraternities notwithstanding the conspiracy laws against trade and other organizations of the working people. It must not be forgotten that according to the law of B. C. 58,²² all the new unions were suppressed. Consequently, we are to infer that those we find in the inscriptions are those belonging to the ancient plan of Numa and Solon which were spared on account of their veteran age and respectability.²³ Another thing requiring the nicest discrimination is the fact that it will not do to mention all the examples set down in the works of the archæologists. We only mention those where the labor organization is clearly defined. Many of these queer inscriptions appear to us to be only private signs and have nothing to do with our theme. Slavery was everywhere prevalent and many of the slaves were as ingenious as the freedmen. We are told by Drumann and others that it was customary for masters to keep their slaves at work and obtain profit from their labor by letting it out to enterprising foreigners who contracted building repairs and other work on private houses and grounds. But the government was the true employer of the unions because they, possessing of themselves as it were, in a unit, all the men in organization, always ready, money, tools, raw material, skill and even the designs requisite to turning out a good job promptly, were dangerous competitors of slavery on large works.²⁴ From the time of Numa the government of Rome had always patronized the trade unions. Thus it would appear that some of the inscriptions may have been private signs used by slave employers who carried on private work upon a small scale, hiring their laboring force of the rich slave owning patricians; and it will not do to count the archæologists' lists of artes et opificia; while it is almost always safe to enumerate their specimens of the Corpora, Sodalicia or *Collegia*²⁵ in our list of trade unions and communes. Trade unionism in its highest form is the reverse of slavery. The true trade union of all ages takes care of its members who are co-owners of equal shares, on equal footing. Slavery then, is the exact antithesis of trade unionism in principle; but although it is certain that the principle on which slavery is based was, especially among the Spartans and Romans, carried out with all its repugnant and appalling brutalities,²⁶ yet it is, as a recognized system in the religio-social economy of the world, incomputably the oldest of the two. Trade unionism was a deadly rival to the slave system all through the antiquity of the Indo-European stock; and since slavery was a graft of the ancient religion—the natural child of its law of primogeniture and the fostered fruit of entailment in the social, political and economic development of those semi-barbarous families, phratries, curies and tribes which came to be nations and empires, it must not be wondered at that this hideous fledgling, before giving up the ghost, made a terrific struggle to regain what it had lost through the mild but determined enterprise of its great competitor trade unionism.

²¹ See Granier, Histoire des Classes Ouvrières, pp. 491-487.

²² See Mommsen, De Collegiis et Sodaliciis Romanorum, cap. IV, pp. 73-78. De Legibus Contra Collegia Latis.

²³ Suetonius, Cæs. 42. "Cæsar cuncta collegia præter antiquitus constituta detraxit."

²⁴ Granier. Hist. des Classes Ouvrières, p. 303, speaking of the insignificance of individuals when compared with the immense force of organized trades, says: "Ici les nombreux ouvrières de Caton (slaves), les 500 ouvriers (slaves) de Crassus n'auraient pu rien faire; il fallait des corporations, (trade unions) des collèges de travailleurs."

²⁵ Cf. Orell. lib. II. pp. 227-246, Collegia Corpora et Sodalicia. Scholæ Artificum et Opificum. See also lib. III, Sup Henzen. Index to Collegia, init.

²⁶ Granier, Hist. des Classes Ouvrières, chap. III and IV., also Plut. Lycurgus and Numa compared.

It was this that constituted the mighty struggle of the revolution in the social economy of the lowly and it so remains to this day; although in this comparatively gorgeous and brilliant hour the spirit of human slavery, resting upon absolute, merchantable ownership of man by man, seems to have forever fled. Nothing now remains of slavery but its skeleton—individual competism—hanging betwixt peace and war over the vortex of revolution and swinging to and fro at every fresh attack from the same trade unionism which, although of prehistoric longevity grows more youthful, enterprising and belligerent with every invention and discovery and every stride of literature, of science and of Christianity.

The unions of the masons at Rome do not appear so numerous as those of the framers among the building trades. Still we find tablets whose inscriptions show their existence.²⁷ We have already mentioned the fact that among the true workmen's organizations the slabs which appear to have been inscribed independently by themselves and without the correctional inspection of masters, often puzzle the experts on account of the sometimes ludicrously bad spelling and misplacement of words. Sometimes also there appear words belonging to the peculiar slang or patois monenclature, their trade's vernacular. But while this is somewhat troublesome to archæologists it is exceedingly interesting to students of ethnology and sociology; since it shows otherwise unrecorded proof that the freedmen, only one step above the slaves, were utterly neglected in all matters of education. The presumption must be that the reason they executed their inscriptions so well is that they had, in their mutual federation a trade union of carvers and gravers cælatores whose business was to work in letters. It was consequently a part of their trade to study sufficiently the Roman and Greek literature to do their work well. Gruter mentions several of them.²⁸ Orelli tells us of the sculptor, signarius artifex, who worked in signs.²⁹ Any of these could make their signs or their monuments and tombstones by being called upon at any time; but we are reminded that then as now, economy was everything and that consequently they themselves might often have depended upon their own inexperienced self-confidence and thus have committed these literary faults which as amateurs they were too unlettered to rectify.

²⁷ Orell. Artes et Opificia, Vol. II, p. 258 of Inscr. Lat. Select Collectio, No. 4,289. It is a broken fragment. "Quadratariorum opus Augurius Catullinus Ursar." We read: "Quadratariorum Corpus." He thus ranks it as a union.

The quadratarii were the true stone cutters' unions and the probable reason why they are not numerous is that most of the work of the stone cutters was done by the marmorarii, marble cutters or marble masons. Of these we find inscriptions of genuine trade unions in considerable numbers. Now this paucity of hard stone-cutters and abundance of marble cutters is easily accounted for. The Geological formation of the Italian, Hellenic and Spanish peninsulas is largely of carbonates of lime. A great share of the Appenine range is composed of fine white marble. Many of the springs and even mountain rivers of Italy, Greece and the Archipelago deposit pure marble. Paros in the Ægean Sea was long a rival in pure white marbles of Pentelicus; and Mount Marpessa the seat of its quarries, may be considered an isolated spur of the Illyrian Alps, Mt. Olympus and the Cambunian range. All through these regions exist the characteristic marbles used in antiquity before the superior powers of duration of sandstone and granites were known. The splendid marble quarries of Luna in Etruria were near at hand and others as celebrated in history were always available to the marble cutters' unions who made the wonderful temples of Ceres at Eleusis, of the Parthenon at Athens and many of the great public structures at Rome. It is therefore, very natural that the marble cutters' unions predominated over the sandstone and granite-cutters in point of numbers; and this explanation we accept for the fewness of trade unions found among the inscriptions under the name quadratarii or stone-cutters. At Rome, even though perhaps many worked in stone harder than marble, the name quadratarius was merged; because even the marble workers hewed and shaped large square blocks. We have, even as it is, enough evidence to assure us that the quadratarii existed and that they were organized into unions; for this is distinctly stated in the law of Constantine of the year 337. These, with the structores and other builders, were enumerated in the list of 35 trade unions recognized at that time. These 35 unions are permitted by this law to exist; although we have found inscriptions and other references giving evidence that at one time more than 50 trade unions existed in Italy, representing as many organized trades, and members innumerable. These will be exhibited as we proceed with the subject. The law of Constantine gives the 35 trade unions existing at one time as follows:

²⁸ Grut. Inscr. Ant. Tot. Orb. Rom., 583, 5. This, Gruter mentions as a sign of some emancipated slave — 'libertus qui post manumissionem vel argentarii vel cælatoris artem exercuerit.' But it often happened that a trade union was inscribed under the name of its magister or director.

²⁹ Orell. Inscr. Lat. Select., No. 4,282.

1. Albarii,³⁰ plasterers; 2. Architecti, architects; 3. Aurifices, goldsmiths; 4. Blatiarii, workers in mosaic; 5. Carpentarii, wagon-makers; 6. Ærarii, brass and copper-smiths; 7. Argentarii, silversmiths; 8. Barbaricarii, gold gilders; 9. Diatritarii, pearl and filigree-workers; 10. Aquæ libratores, waterers; 11. Deauratores, auratores or bractearii, gold gilders, beaters; 12. Eburarii, ivory workers; 13. Figuli, potters; 14. Fullones, fullers; 15. Ferrarii, blacksmiths; 16. Fusores, founders; 17. Intestinarii, joiners; 18. Lapidarii, lapidaries; 19. Laquearii, plasterers; 20. Medici, doctors; 21. Mulo medici, horse doctors, veterinary surgeons; 22. Musivarii, decorators; 23. Marmorarii, marble-cutters; 24. Pelliones, furriers; 25. Pictores, painters; 26. Plumbarii, plumbers; 27. Quadratarii, stone-cutters; 28. Specularii, looking-glass makers; 29. Statuarii, staturiers; 30. Scasores or Pavimentarii, pavers; 31. Sculptores, sculptors; 32. Structores, masons; 33. Tessellarii, pavers in mosaic; 34. Tignarii, carpenters; 35. Vitriarii, glaziers.³¹

Here we have the building trades represented in Con-

³⁰ Codex Justiniani, 10, 64. 1.

³¹ Mentioned once in Orell Inscr. 4,277; whereas the more correctly Latin term is given by him as an organized union, Idem 4,112.

stantine's more human law for the post-Christian organization. It is well here to state that Constantine²² became a Christian, being the first who threw off the yoke of paganism. He evidently did not understand its true ideas and was far from being a Christian at heart; but he was a politician, and Christian enough to be unbiased by the old Pagan belief in the divine aristocracy of the gens family, in which ratiocination Cicero had believingly fought the unions of working people on the ground of their unfitness to aspire to freedom and manhood. This stereotyped logic of the Pagan faith based on the divinity of the slave code, had been overthrown and completely annihilated by the new doctrine of Jesus, which did not war against slavery but subverted it by a new idea of equality—a plan which, at the time of Constantine, was already 300 years old.

Of the artizans in the building trades we find sufficient mention in history; but very little reference to their organization into trade unions. Plutarch²³ and others state most clearly that the builders were all ranked into a class by themselves under the wise distribution of King Numa and he applies for them the Greek term technitai. So in Latin, artifices. They held this organization uninterruptedly for 600 years at Rome and under the much praised laws of Solon, nearly as many years in Attica and other parts of Greece. In the year 58 before Christ the conspiracy laws struck them a hard blow, which like an earthquake severely shook them as far as the Greek provinces, their primitive cradle; but they became more secret and political, rallied and outlived their persecutors.

Among the other builders' unions were the architects. These interlinked with the masons, carpenters, joiners and others whenever a building was ordered by the government; and contracted to do the work at prices agreed upon. The intestinarii,²⁴ or as we call them, the joiners, or inside finishers of buildings, had also their trade organizations and appear to have been in the federation in undertaking contracts to erect and finish temples or other public edifices.

²² See De Excusationibus, Artificum, in Codex Theodosii, lib. 18, tit. 4, lex. 2.

²³ Plutarch Life of Numa. Numa and Lycurgus Compared.

²⁴ Muratori, Thesaurus Veterum Inscriptionum, 937, 7, mentions a fine inscription found at Capua which is interesting, as it shows the plausibility of our conjecture, in the sketch of Spartacus, as to the causes of the immense multitude of freedmen who joined his army "Fabri intestinarii. secundum Budæum, ex ligno opera conficiebant minutioris artificii, quibus tantum locus est intra ædes." Seq. Mur. 929, 6.

An organization of plasterers is also recognized in the law of Justinian and exempted from persecution, by the code of Theodosius. These unions are not mentioned in Plutarch's list of Numa's trades because the latter consolidated the building trades into one general fraternity with an object, as Plutarch explicitly recounts, of conciliating the jealousies of nationality well-known to have been a cause of contention and turmoil between the Albans and Sabines. By "breaking them up into powder," to use his own words, Numa taught them to mix and the contact of the particles produced a perfectly conciliatory effect. In other words, throw off the question of boundary lines which disturb workingmen and they instantly see that "an injury to one is the concern of all."

CHAPTER XV.

THE ARMY SUPPLIES.

ORGANIZED ARMOR-MAKERS OF ANTIQUITY.

TRADE UNIONS TURNED to the Manufacture of Arms and Munitions of War—How it came about—The Iron and Metal Workers—Artists in the Alloys—How Belligerent Rome was Furnished with Weapons, Shoes and Other Necessaries for Her Warriors—The Shieldmakers, Arrowsmiths, Daggersmiths, War-Gun and Slingmakers, Battering-Ram-makers etc.—Bootmakers who Cobbled for the Roman Troops—Wine Men, Bakers and Sutlers—All Organized—Unions of Oil Grinders; of Pork Butchers; even of Cattle Fodderers—The Haymakers—Organized Fishermen—Ancient Labor brought charmingly near by Inscriptions.

OF the nine regular trade unions authorized by Numa Pompilius, one was that of the metal workers. They were all incorporated into a community, as workers of hard metals, before iron came to be much in use.¹ Writers who lived in ancient times often treat the subject of useful metals in the light that iron and steel did not come into use until after the foundation of Rome, or 758 years anterior to the Christian era. At that early time however, the ærarîi or metal workers melted copper with the ores of zinc and knew how to sprinkle the zinc with powdered charcoal during the process of its fusion with copper to prevent it from escaping in fumes of the oxide. It may also be stated that little improvement has ever been made in the manufacture of brass; and even the ancient process of using zinc ore instead of the refined article did not come into use until A. D. 1781. It would not be surprising if further investigations should lead to the discovery that it was the enterprise of trade unions which led to this and other inventions and discoveries in the arts; for the purely slave system did little or nothing for art or science and the earliest forms of industry outside of slavery seems to have been those of workmen combined for mutual aid. Flavius Josephus in his history of the Jews makes elaborate mention of Solomon's temple, as having been built in a large degree by the trade unions under Hiram a man of extraordinary skill in the building crafts. Not willing to accept our own interpretation of Josephus, we refer the reader to the remarks of Granier upon this subject;² as he seems to have settled it that they were organized trades.

¹ Lucretius, speaking of brass, says: "Et prior erat æris quam ferri cognitus
nens."

Little doubt can be entertained that iron, at the time of Numa, was also in use at Rome.³ Yet there is no mention made in proof that Numa organized the ferrarii or iron workers of whom Orelli furnishes two inscriptions,⁴ one of which represents a genuine trade union, which proves beyond any counter evidence that the iron workers were organized. But abundant evidence exists in the later laws restricting organization, and these clubs stand among the excused, in the list of 35 unions of the code of Theodosius. If any further doubt can possibly remain as to the use of iron by blacksmiths, forgers and finishers at the time of Numa, we have only to refer the critic to Homer, and the celebrated historic inscription called the Arundelian slab, also to the bible.⁵

² Josephus, Antiquities of the Jews, book VII, chap. II, noticed by Granier. Histoire des Classes Ouvrières, p. 289, note: "Ce que Flavius Joseph raconte des travaux qui furent, à plusieurs reprises, exécutés à Jérusalem, soit pour bâtir le temple, soit pour le relever ou le réparer, ne permet pas de douter que les ouvriers, tant juifs que sidoniens, qu'on y employa, ne fussent organisés en corporations. D'ailleurs toute espèce de doute est levé par le passage suivant, où il est clairement parlé de la hiérarchie qui régnait parmi ces ouvriers, et des trois mille deux cents MARTRES qu'avaient les quatre-vingt mille maçons occupés aux murailles du temple: Ἦσαν δ' ἐκ τῶν παροίκων οὓς Δαυίδης καταλελοίπε . . . τῶν δὲ λατομούντων ὀκτάκι μύριοι· τούτων δ' ἐπιζάται τριχίλιοι καὶ τριακυσιοί."

³ Pliny, Nat. Hist., XXXIV, 89 says: "Proxime indicari debent metalla ferri, optimo pessimoque vitæ instrumento."

⁴ Orell., Inscriptionum Latinarum Selectarum, Nos. 4,066 and 1,289. The first of these is a union of sling makers who constructed out of iron the formidable ballistæ which threw with deadly effect stones and other missiles into the ranks of an enemy, it reads as follows: "Volcano sacr. T. Flavius Florus Sacerdos Dei Solis Statua Marmoris Collegii ballistariorum et Collegii ferrariorum." It was found at Rome and catalogued by Donati, II, p. 225, §. We fill out the abbreviated words.

⁵ Homer, Iliad, XXIII, 261, "Ἡδὲ γυναικας εὐξάνους, πολίων τ' αἰδῆρον." Sam. Pettit's Studies of the Arundelian Inscription; Bible, Genesis, chap. IV. Job, chap. XXVII.

The silver and gold workers did not confederate with these metal workers. We reserve mention of them for a place farther on. Orelli, among his inscriptions gives sufficient specimens carved upon marble and other slabs, some of which have stood the grim erosions of the ages of time that have seen all things else crumble into dust since they were fresh from the chisel of the cælatores.⁶

After the death of Numa the doors of the temple of Janus were again flung open, which meant that Rome was again ready for war. This king had closed them as was customary in time of peace. He desired peace with the world in order that the nation might develop upon its own resources, and by its own labor. The 43 years of his peaceful reign gave the artisans time to organize, forget their petty disagreements and settle down upon a basis of fraternity and thrift. And they not only developed their skill but organized it so that after the king's death, when war again broke out, the nation found these metal workers ready to turn their skilled labor to manufacturing swords, shields and all the arms and munitions of the contests which followed.

Thus labor at Rome did not suffer by war, because the Roman arms were successful through a long period of 500 years. During this time the Romans conquered the world with arms manufactured to some extent and we are inclined to think, to a very great extent, by the iron and metal workers organized by Numa. They loved their trade unions and remained organized, working in fraternal bond, in common enjoyment of the fruits of their united labor in spite of several attempts on the part of the senate to put them down. The system, as we have already shown, was to manufacture arms and other munitions of war directly for the government out of raw material which belonged to and was produced from, the mines of the government.

We have seen that the land belonged to the Roman state; that it was farmed by the proletaries on shares and that these shares were collected mostly "in kind," by an organization of unions. These customs-collectors distributed the products of the land each year among the citizen class who virtually possessed and comprised the government. So also with regard to the mines which produced raw material for the iron and other metal workers to convert into lances, darts, swords and all sorts of armor for the Roman army. With the land, the mines also belonged to the government. There consequently had to be a trade union of miners whom the Romans called ferrarii,⁷ if miners of iron, and ærfodinarii, if miners of copper.

⁶ Orell. in his Latin Inscriptions, numbers the cælatores as follows: Nos. 4 133, 4,060, 4,066, 4,140, 4,061, 1,239, 361 and 946. Each of these numbers chronicles a genuine trade union.

These miners of Copper and iron were naturally federated together. Neither the union of forgers and smiths nor of the copper and brass or bronze workers could buy and exploit their own mining works in order to supply the workmen and fulfill their contracts with the government, because they did not own the mines. Nor could the workmen at the mines accomplish such an end. The government possessed the mines and in many cases let them to contractors. It remained, therefore, for the workmen whose managers were often the contractors, to preserve a close federation of their trades, no matter how distant they were located apart. We are told⁸ that at the winter quarters of the rebel army of Spartacus at Thuria, he established an armory of large proportions. It was near the mountains and probably near mines of iron and copper; and as his army was composed of workingmen, many of whom were skilful artisans they co-operated as by common consent, and practically used their federation at both the mines and the forge. The iron and metal workers, who were thus confederated or "distributed" by Numa into unions for the purpose of harmony in the arts of peace, were, after his death, thus kept in the same bond of union many hundred years, helping Rome to practice her arts of war. The plan of Government employment directly, without middlemen was a happy one and the long vista of time from the trade union laws of Numa to the conspiracy laws of Cicero and Cæsar was the true golden age of Rome.

Immediately after the death of Numa Pompilius, that wisest of monarchs, perhaps, of whom the world's history makes mention, the doors of the celebrated temple of Janus were thrown open and Mars, the bellicose myth war-god rushed out with trumpets, javelins and the clangor of contention. We are going to recount one seemingly phenomenal instance in human history where labor and war existed harmoniously and thrived together. The king in instructing his people in the arts of peace had actually laid the foundation for the most gigantic successes ever before known in the arts of war! He had taught the state to employ the labor of trade unions direct. He had taught how to do this without the complications, individual emulations, avaricious ambitions and failures which, in wars often break up great schemes through the jealousy and incompetence of individual rule. He had simplified the labor of production, distribution, consumption by himself employing all the artisans of his realm and directing them to husband the resources of the state which was then the owner of the lands, mines and the waters. The workers being themselves exempt from serving in war by reason of their supposed ignoble origin and rank, had no fear of the tedious campaign nor dread of the carnage of battle. They knew how to make the steel that was to pierce the bodies of those they loved not, and whom when they were enslaved, their ancestors had hated as mortal foes. They were happy. Rome was turned into a vast armory. The members of the well organized unions were the first to receive employment from the government which was not theirs and for 500 years were the last to be maltreated or discharged.

⁷ Muratori. Thesaurus Veterum Inscriptionum, 972, 10, also idem, 963, 2.

⁸ Plutarch, Crassus, VIII, XII. See also Florus, III. 20, 6, speaking of improvising weapons. "E ferro egastulorum recocto gladios ac tela fecerunt."

Had it been possible for king Numa to live and reign with his peace measures during those 500 years we know not what would have been the consequence but it would have probably resulted in a far different destiny for the human race. His scheme was to cultivate the elements of peace and he was wise enough to understand that labor was a respectable factor. Under him it was indeed becoming a cult; and could he have lived long enough to engraft his peace system, with all its civilizing and soothing effects, until the people far and near had endorsed it as a second nature, the irascible and grasping as well as the concupiscent ingredients of our nature which dominate warlike tribes must have absorbed enough of the great refining gem of sympathy, to have started the Indo-Europeans in quite a different direction from the murderous warpath of conquest which they actually took, leading to ignorance and brutality. It might have been better for the trade unions to confine manufacturing the implements of peace as Numa ordered. But so long as the Roman arms prevailed, Roman trade organizations under the war system were safe; and the workmen doubtless cared little for the refinements of peace, although the neutral position they assumed as workingmen and their educational discussions among themselves certainly developed more of sympathy and far less of cupidity and irascibility than was possessed by the optimates who managed and fought out the brutal orgies of warfare.

From the foregoing we know that no great amount of work was done by the iron and metal workers in the line of armor manufacture during the lifetime of Numa. After his death, when the warring spirit of the patrician class was aroused to anticipations of the ancient scenes of valor and blood, it was found that Rome was without arms and munitions of war. The helmets and shields, the sabres and javelins had been forged into mattocks, spades and cutlery of domestic use. It was necessary to make a new beginning. That the ferrarii or iron workers possessed a federation with the sword cutlers is certain, although the exact date of that co-operation is difficult to ascertain. It must have been old, however. A number of inscriptions bearing evidence of this are recorded by Orelli;⁹ and we have distinct mention in the digest¹⁰—showing that these unions or fraternities of workmen were fixed by law. The trade unions had then in their federation the gladiarii or sword cutlers, the sagittarii or arrow-smiths, the scutarii or elliptical shield makers who, however, made this armor of wood and sometimes covered it with thick rawhide, sometimes with plate metal; and the clipearii or round shield makers who made them of copper or bronze; the telarii or manufacturers of darts and javelins; the scalperii, knife makers, and the hastarii or spear makers. There was another trade union, the collegium ballistariorum,¹¹ mentioned also in the digest,¹² the special

⁹ Orelli., Inscr. Lat. Select. Coll. Nos. 4,197, 4,247., Artes et Opifcia.

¹⁰ Tarrant 50, 6, 6, dig. "gladiarii, sagittarii, carpentarii, aquifices, scandularii, etc."

¹¹ Orelli., idem, No. 4,066, Donati, 2, p. 225.

¹² Tarrant, dig. 50, 6, 6. This was a genuine trade union which had a con business of whose numbers was to manufacture the celebrated ballista, a kind of mitrailleuse, or stone thrower, which with great force and deadly effect flung large pebbles or small stones and other projectiles into the ranks of an enemy. Much engineering skill was required to operate this engine of war. Doubtless the unions were obliged to send their own mechanics to adjust and manipulate these huge engines. But it is more probable¹³ that they were federated with the great trade union now known by numerous very interesting and unmistakable inscriptions as the *collegium mensorum machinariorum*¹⁴ or trade union of machine adjusters and setters, whose business was to oversee the work of transporting any finished machinery to the place of its destination and supervise or perform the work of setting it in operation. The body or union¹⁵ which is referred to in the inscription given in the foot-note below evidently combined the two functions of trade union and burial society. Furius and Lollius were officers, being both members of the society of machinists; and were buried at the expense of the funeral branch and out of the funeral fund. The amount of 25 *denarii*¹⁶ was mentioned for the funeral expenses. Roses costing 5 more were to be put upon the coffin. For the funeral expenses of their aged parents one-half this amount was to be appropriated. In case these requirements were not conformed to, there would be a forfeiture on the part of the trade union of double this sum annually, which forfeiture should be covered into the treasury of the funeral branch.

siderable membership, as the construction of these huge engines required much labor and skill.

¹³ Mommsen constantly bemoans the silence of historians on these extremely interesting subjects. We render for our readers some of his own lamentations: "The deep silence of the stones containing the inscribed constitutions and restrictions, prevents us from determining which (meaning the trade unions were under the law and which adverse to the privileges granted by the senate)." De Coll. et Sodal. Romanorum, p. 80.)

¹⁴ Gruterius, Inscriptiones Antiquæ Totius Orbis Romanorum, 91, 1. Muratorius, Thesaurus Velerum Inscriptionum, 528, 3. Orellius, Inscriptionum Latinarum Collectio, No. 4,107. The inscription reads: "D. M. C. Turius. C. T. Lollius quitquit ex corpore mensorum machinariorum funeraticii nomine sequetur, reliquum penes Rempublicam super scriptam remanere volo ex cujus usuris peto a vobis college uti suscipere dignemini VI diebus solemnibus sacrificium mihi faciatis. Id est IIII id. mart. die natalis mei usque ad XXV denarios, Parentalis XII semis. Flos rosa V. Si facta non fuerint, tunc, fisco stacionis annonæ duplum funeraticium dare debebitis."

¹⁵ See Orell., Inscr. Lat. Coll., Vol III, p. 170. Varia collegiorum nomina.

¹⁶ A Roman denarius of the period of Cicero was worth 16½ cents. Böckh.

This strange, progressive co-operation of the lowly, industrious, ingenious but despised moiety of the ancient people may justly be regarded as a lost lesson. Until now it has rested in profoundest darkness. So utterly ignored was labor by the ancient historians¹⁷ that even the nominal terminations affixed to nouns and particles in the Latin tongue, giving the technical forms that were in commonest use for artizans of every kind, do not appear, if we except a very few in Pliny and one or two other writers on art. On account of this extraordinary neglect our lexicographers are obliged to have constant recourse to modern archæologists in whose works appear inscriptions verbatim, from the time-crumbled stones! From no other source can they with classic authority complete the vocabularies of the language! But this authority is justly considered good. These stones tell tales which the prevaricating, mellifluous sycophants at the court of the Cæsars dared not smirch their parchment with.

The arietarii or battering ram makers do not appear as belonging to a union by themselves. If this was ever the case we have not been able to discover any inscription bearing record of the fact. But they existed. Livy repeatedly speaks of the aries or battering ram; and it is known to have been at first a simple device, consisting of a huge beam sometimes 150 feet long which a large force of men held on their shoulders and by repeated backward and forward runs, the bronze-plated ram or head, striking against the wall of an enemy's town, broke or rammed down the masonry so that the soldiers rushed through the breaches and sacked the place. It is quite probable that these ram makers were merged into the membership of the catapultarii or *balistarii*¹⁸ who manufactured these huge machines, in connection with the catapults or stone slings. However this may have been, it was certainly due to the ingenuity and industry of the machinists that the battering ram developed from this simple form until, in its state of perfection, it was hung by chains to the boom of a tripod fastened by guys; and thus swayed forward and backward by human or mule power so as to beat down the strongest walls.

¹⁷ Drummann, Arb. u. Comp., p. 155. "Befriedigende Nachrichten sucht man vergabens."

¹⁸ Grell. No. 4,066, Ballistariorum Collegium

Then among others of the armor makers were the jaculatorii or slingers. Darts, jacula, were in common use with the ancients. They were easily broken, were of short duration and consequently had to be manufactured in large quantities; and we are told they were manufactured along with other armaments in Rome and other industrial centers, by the unions who found in the government a reliable employer that paid well for the work.¹⁹

The Collegium Caligariorum (soldiers' boot makers or cobblers), was a trade union of shoemakers who manufactured and supplied shoes for the army.²⁰ During the warlike ages which intervened between the reign of Numa Pompilius and the first emperors, a large army was almost constantly employed by the Roman government. These had to be supplied with food, clothing, barracks, tents and impedimenta and all the paraphernalia of war. In those times, to be a soldier was a grace; to be a cobbler a disgrace; and as the membership of the collegia was always composed of freedmen or emancipated slaves, with their children and their children's children who constituted the great proletariat of Rome, the labor which their fore fathers performed as slaves, came down with them in disgrace. This is the real origin of the taint of labor—the social degradation of the poor who performed it. It is the blackened obloquy, flinging its attendant odium and fastening its stain alike on him who performs and on his performance. These corvine haters of those who fed them, painted social rank festooned in contumacy which fastened upon and clung tight to the heart and soul of both rich and poor, cowing the workmen into the unmanly belief that both labor and the laborer were as mean as they were believed to be. Thus contempt for labor had descended from generation to generation with an ignoble belief in the lowliness of social grade. But the work of the soldier was honorable. At first, only the patrician and his sons, the grandees of the realm, could enjoy the honor of a soldier's life. But times had changed. The slave who became a freedman had organized himself into the union of resistance against oppression and we find him now a member of the soldier's shoemaking union, by far the happier man of the two, purveying boots and shoes to the comparatively useless ranks of the Roman army whose trade, like that of the brigands, was to rob and destroy, not to produce. Especially must this great truth have gladdened him, since by reason of his organization which at that time there was no law to forbid, he realized easier times. There were then no organized, competing industries, monopolizing his business. In the certitude of employment and its remuneration, though there was little hope of affluence, he was content.²¹ This was certainly the Golden era. The inscriptions bear witness that the society became the instrument of much social pleasure and probably instruction. Indeed, this could not have been otherwise as all the testimony of experience in the scale of social pleasures and means of advancement were similar to those of exactly similar unions of our own times. Working people were not honored by any of the noble or heroic professions; such as the pursuits of war, which were not considered ignoble, or of writing the history of war.²²

¹⁹ Granier, Histoire des Classes Ouvrières, chap. xii, pp. 302-304. "Dans son côté, le gouvernement avait besoin de trouver toujours un nombre et une variété d'ouvriers suffisants pour exécuter ses ouvrages; et quels ouvrages que ceux qu'a fait exécuter le gouvernement Romain! Que de temples et quels temples! Que d'aqueducs et quels aqueducs! Que de ponts et quels ponts!"

²⁰ Gräter, Inscr. Ant. Rom., 649, 1. See also Drumann, Arbeiter und Communisten in Rom, who, quoting Cicero, Pro Flacc. 7, says: "Eben so die Schuster sutores, welche Cicero mit den Gürtlern, zonariis, als verächtliche Volksklasse nennt, bildeten eine besondere Zunft nach Numas Einrichtung."

²¹ The whole truth is, government patronized, employed and protected the trade unions for more than 500 years. Granier in correctly denying that either the very rich or the indignant individuals upheld the unions, says: "Restait enfin le gouvernement. C'était là le vrai client des jurandes, et les travaux entrepris par lui formaient le seul atelier permanent où les ouvriers pussent gagner chaque jour leur salaire." Granier, Histoire des Classes Ouvrières, p. 303. Again, idem, pp. 303-4, Granier says: "De son côté, le gouvernement avait besoin de trouver toujours un nombre et une variété d'ouvriers suffisants pour exécuter ses ouvrages; et quels ouvrages que ceux qu'a fait exécuter le gouvernement romain! Que de temples et quels temples! Que d'aqueducs, et quels aqueducs! Que de ponts, et quels ponts! Ici les nombreux ouvriers de Caton, les cinq cents ouvriers de Crassus n'auraient pu rien faire; il fallait des corporations, des collèges de travailleurs; et c'est parce qu'ils se firent perpétuellement leurs patrons et leurs commanditaires, que le sénat et les empereurs s'immiscèrent dans leurs statuts. La loi des Douze Tables, qui ordonne à toute corporation de se conformer aux lois générales de l'Etat, est donc en réalité le premier privilège établi en faveur des classes ouvrières déjà organisées régulièrement à cette époque." According to this, the Roman government was the employer of the trade unions to an enormous extent; and this explains the cause of the terrible conflicts reaching from the time of Viriathus to the suppression of the unions. B, C, 58.

²² So proud was the gens family that even convicts, condemned to the Roman prisons for life, if of noble extraction, could not be put to hard labor because it would tarnish, not the man, but the family or gens name. This could not be sul-

Very few pursuits involving labor were looked upon as fitting a gentleman in ancient days; and any admixture however indifferent in these pursuits, sullied the proud claims to aristocracy and family prestige.

The trade union system therefore, which assumed the entire care and responsibility of all labor both in production and distribution, except that performed by the slaves who always lingered upon the gens estates, was an economy to the ruling minority; for it relieved them from the real perplexities of toil, and it gratified their pride by absolving them from the stigma which attached to all manipulations of producing and distributing that, without which they must have starved.

We propose to devote a few pages to a consideration of the great trade union method of victualing not only this non-working minority and the army but the entire population of Rome. In the closely allied branch of this great system—that of the customs collectors—we have already approximately shown what may be called this system in outline; we shall soon give the system itself.

The use of wine was very common in those countries in ancient times and was an important article of food. There were two communes of wine dealers, one at Rome and one at the mouth of the Tiber. Maffei cites an inscription, which was found at Verona.²³ Its date is that of the emperors, as it has the name of Augustus, and it portrays a genuine union of the wine men who furnished Rome with that beverage. These organizations were in communication with the productive interior of Italy and may have had wagons and boats, either of their own, or engaged and paid by them to bring the wine to their storehouses; if wagons, direct to the city; and if ships or boats, to the port of Ostia where it was stored and cured, often smoked as we shall describe, and at the proper time distributed to consumers. Not only the wine produced from the government lands and accruing to the citizens in form of rent payable in kind as noticed in the remarks on the Vectigalarii or customs collectors, but also all the remainder that the farmers did not need for lied, even by crime until a later period. See Bombardini, De Carcere et Antiquo Ejus Usu, cap. VIII, p. 763 of Thesaurus Grævi et Gronovii.

²³ Maffei, Museum Veronense, 114, 2. "Quinquennalis corporum vinariorum urbanorum et Ostensium.

their own use was sent to market; and of course, in the absence of competing lines of transportation such as now exist, the wine was sent to Rome by the same watermen who took the rent. The most of it, however, went overland by wagons and we have reason to believe, in a crude state; for there existed at Rome more than one union of fumatores, or wine curers who matured their wines with smoke. This was done by an apparatus in shape of a hogshead containing wine, through which smoke was forced by means of force pipes. At Tarentum, was found an inscription which plainly mentions the collegium fumatorum. It was sketched by Münter, and incorporated as a regular trade union into the great collection of Orelli.²⁴ The wines of the ancients were rich and excellent. The task of the unions was to finish the taste and color so that they constituted the richest and healthiest beverage to be found. To this day the wines of Italy are counted among the most delicious; but it is questionable whether they are as well cured as in ancient times or whether they are as plenty.

There was a union of cultivators and dealers in table or olive oils, collegium oleariorum,²⁵ whose business in part, was to grind and prepare the oils from the fruit of the olive tree which grows luxuriantly in southern Europe. The great entrepot of Rome,²⁶ was Ostia, at the mouth of the river Tiber 18 miles from Rome. The quantity of work carried on by the waterman between Ostia and Rome must have been enormous considering the slow, toilsome method

²⁴ Orelli, Analecta Nonnulla, No. 5,044; "D. M. Fecit, Collegium Fumatorum bene merente." It was found at Tarentum. Orelli adds: "Novum mihi accidit Collegium Fumatorum."

²⁵ Fabretti, Inscriptionum Artiquarum Explicatio, 731-750, citing the inscription, originally found at Ostia, but now in Florence, ²⁶ Orelli, Inscr. Lat. Coll., vol. II, 238, remarks: "In magno Collegiorum et artium memero, notandum in primis, decurias, non corpora vel Collegia constituisse Ostiæ." In proof of this see Orelli, Inscr., No. 4,109, which enumerates 18 trade unions in one tablet, which we produce for the curious critic. The great epigraphist reminds us in a note that these are not mere corporations but trade unions, (see ante). The inscription runs thus: "Cneo Sentio Cn. fil. ter. felici Dec. ædificio adl. Decurionum decreto adlecto Quaestori Aedili ostiens II, vir. Q. juvenum.

Hic primus omnium quo anno decimo adlectus est et qui a facto est et in proximum duo vires designat. Est quinque curatorum navium marinariorum gratis adlect. inter (sic) novicular. Maris Hadriatici. Et ad quadrigam fori vinariorum. Patrono decuriæ scribar. præconum et—et argentariorum, et negotiatorum, vinariorum. Ab Urbe item mensorum, frumentariorum cereris. Aug. item collegia scaphariorum et lenunculariorum. Traject. Luculli et dendrophorum et lege Rogatorum. A faro et de sacomar; et libertorum et servorum publicorum. Oleariorum et juvenum cisianorum et veteranorum. Aug. item beneficiariorum. Aug. et piscatorum, propolariorum curatori lusius juvenalis.

Cneus Sentius Lucillus Gamala. Clodianus. F. Patri indulgentissemus."

of propelling little boats. In those days of crude method and meagre facility the functions of a trade union appear not to have been confined to this simple business. It appears from the inscriptions and other data that the manufacturers of an article were often the distributors of it. Thus in the case of the wine smokers, the same union that bought the crude grape juice which arrived through the labors of the unions of coasters, lenuncularii, plying between the Adriatic or Mediterranean landings and the chief depots as Ostia and Pissæ or Tarentum, or that which arrived on board the larger ships of the navicularii from greater distances, as Spain or from Gaul via Arles, assumed also the duty of curing these wines and of putting them into the hands of consumers. This explains the phenomenon as to there being comparatively few middlemen or petty shopkeepers among the Romans although there were many even of these.²⁷ It also leads to an explanation of the curious fact that merchants were considered nearly as low and unworthy the respect of the high-born class as the mechanics and laborers. In those early days, before the development of the vast commerce which belongs to the Christian era, business of any kind whether mechanical, mercantile or agricultural was held under ban and men did not espouse it except as a necessity. This contempt, an inculcation of the aristocratic religion, lived as long as that religion reigned; but when Christianity established itself upon its revolutionary basis of exact equality of all men, the contempt fell to the ground; and gradually the aristocracy of wealth rose in the place of the ancient aristocracy of birth. But as it was not inherent in manual labor to produce much more than the individual laborer consumes, and perfectly possible for the mercantile system to amass—sometimes enormously—the mechanic and laborer continue to be poor and considered with contempt while the speculators on their products rise to the loftiest respectability. But all this is because Christianity is only in its theoretical condition, having not yet, on account of the stupendous magnitude of the revolution it has undertaken, acquired and put in operation the mechanical instrumentalities for the practical realization of its scheme.

So also the oil grinders union was in the habit of buying crude oils or unpressed olives on board the ships and boats at Ostia, conveying them to their storehouses, running them through their presses or grinders, purifying, curing and bottling them in ollas, even placing them at the command of the triclinarch himself. To do this required a large number of members in the commune or union; but this furnished steady employ in which each member felt himself a co-operator or co-owner which not only secured him or her from the dangers of dismissal but must also have been a great comfort; since members felt the dignity of their position, lowly of course, compared with the rich non-workers who looked upon labor with disdain, yet independent in comparison with the dispropertied and maltreated slaves.

²⁷ See Orell., Nos. 4,139-4,300, Artes et Officia.

Bread was another commodity the supply of which became largely the task of the trade unions from very early times. The ancient method of baking differed little from that of the present day. The ancient bakers' unions, then, were in nearly all respects, identical with the bakers' unions in New York city to-day. We have abundance of testimony regarding the unions of bakers. A corpus pastillariorum mentioned by Muratori,²⁸ was one of the post-Christian communes. The pastillarii were manufacturers of dainty loaves, biscuits, cakes and bon-bons.

Then there were the regular bread bakers, panfices or pistores who also, as part of their task, ground or beat grain into flour or meal with a pestle.²⁹ One can at a glance conceive that the amount of this work was enormous. The method of making bread was the same as now; for very little has ever been added for facilitating its rapid manufacture; but the method of grinding has been so greatly improved as to admit of scarcely a comparison. It required a large force of workmen in those times to pound up and bake the three different kinds of bread consumed by the whole people rich and poor, of Rome.³⁰ But these men during a cycle of 700 years were organized and they enjoyed a trade union in all probability from long before the time of Numa. Their scope was wide, their members large, their business steady, their work guaranteed; and they had the balmy satisfaction of knowing that they were safe.

²⁸ Cf. Mur. Thesaur. Veterum Inscriptionum, 527, 5. Anno post Chr. 435.

²⁹ Cod. Theod., lib. XIV, tit. 3. The bakers were among the unions which enjoyed the jus coeundi or right of organization. See Codex Theodosius, de Excusationibus Artificum, lib. XIII, tit. IV, leg. 2. The organized bakers and boatmen were among the most numerous and powerful in Italy.

³⁰ We have shown in our chapters on strikes and uprisings that the slave portion of the proletaries were fed on pease and nuts. See Granier Histoire des Classes Ouvrières, pp. 96-97. "Dès les premiers temps, avons-nous dit, les esclaves se trouvèrent séparés des hommes libres et firent race à part; ils allèrent nourris et vêtus d'une façon propre et spéciale. Les juifs leur perçaient l'oreille, les Grecs et les Romains les marquaient au front, d'où le nom de Stichus était resté commun et général parmi les esclaves. Dès le temps d'Homère, leur régime ali-

Another great and very important organization of the laboring people was that of the butchers. A considerable branch of this business was performed by the suarii or pork butchers. It is stated that the wealthy repudiated pork and confined their diet of meat to fish, venison and mutton. But it must not be forgotten that there were organized unions of suarii or pork butchers, and we have evidence that they drove a heavy business. What did Rome want of pork butchers if her citizen population refused to use pork and her slave population was not allowed to use meat of any kind? This is a troublesome question, to be solved only by the student of history and archæology, from a standpoint of social science. By the student of social science it is seen, that there existed a very large class of the poor, but manly, better fed, self-sustaining, hard working element of the proletaries who were freedmen and always organized; and as we are assured by abundant evidence from their own inscriptions, always capable of living well. This is the class which consumed the products of the suarii. The animals were raised in southern parts of the peninsula, in great numbers and probably were of an excellent breed. According to Granier they were driven or conveyed in wagons to Rome alive. The work of the pork butchers was not confined to killing and dressing them. In the etymology of the word "confection" we have a history of a part of their business. The ancient confectioner was a slaughterer of swine; but in addition to this work he prepared his pork in a great number of ways. He made sausage meats of several varieties, corned pork, smoked bacon and ham, very much as we do now. From data which we have observed, there seems to be little difference between the ancient and mentaire était réglé et ils ne mangeaient pas de pain fait de froment." So Guhl and Koner, Life of the Greeks and Romans, pp. 501-2, after describing the sumptuous dishes of the Romans of rank, conclude with the remark on the poor, that they "at all periods chiefly fed on porridge (puls), made of a farinaceous substance (far, ador), which served them as bread, besides vegetables, such as cabbage (brassica), turnips and raddishes, leek (porrum), garlic (allium), onions (cepa) pulse (legumina), cucumber (cucumis), pumpkins, melons, etc." They had no except on occasions such as the entertainments of the theasos and the so- m.

the modern methods of preserving and using the flesh of the swine. But there is one observation which cannot well be avoided here.

Pork, according to the ancient religions, both of the Indo-Europeans and Jews, was always repudiated. It was strictly a proletarian aliment. The reason why it became popular on the table of the Christians and lost its ancient stigma is, that the early Christians were themselves proletaries and did not belong to the nobles who fed on fish, fat venison and mutton. Christianity in boldly proclaiming the revolution on a basis of equality of all men, was not ashamed to live up to its professions. By far the largest number of its membership were poor. The poor freedmen were glad to get pork to eat. The Saviour himself was one of them, without an atom of aristocracy in his veins and consequently unhampered by old religious prejudices, restrictions or usages. This new sect, poor and persecuted, struggling for the existence of its tenets and its members, began life at Rome in earnest, although born in Judea. Its first members were the poor work people—freedmen and slaves—all of whom were not above a plate of ham and eggs; and to say the least, the new sect exhibited much sound sense in calmly adopting the usages of the diet and clothing of the commons.

Its tenets expressed and inculcated the new idea that by birth one was as good as another; and it also logically and by implication defended the dignity of pork and sausage as it did the makers of pork and sausage and every other food available which was found palatable and nutritious.

We do not find mention either in the inscriptions or elsewhere of butchers located at Ostia, the port of Rome. This, however, is accounted for by the supply of hogs, sheep and cattle being in an opposite direction from the emporium. There is an abundant mention of the pecuarii, or cattle breeders and their greges or herds. They took the government pasture lands on shares, and at the close of the year paid to the tax collectors the share agreed upon. What remained over this amount, which was paid in cattle, sheep and hogs more frequently than in money, was their own; and they sold it to the butchers at the market.

When the rich gentry made their encroachment upon the public land and drove these pecuarii from the pastures, thus usurped, as we have already shown,³¹ the slaves were forced to do this work; and in many parts of Italy this ancient system was at an end. Very little mention is made of true trade unions of butchers in the inscriptions thus far discovered except those of the suarii or pork butchers. Granier suggests that these conducted the whole butcher business of Rome;³² but this is a matter which we leave in abeyance, in the absence of more exact data.

There were unions of workmen whose task was to fodder cattle and other animals of the stock farms. One of these a collegium pabulariorum is given us by Donati.³³ They were allied to the haymakers; for hay is one kind of pabulum or fodder. It is an inscription of a genuine labor union, and is curious, showing how systematic they must have been in getting down to nice distinctions, something like the division of labor of the present day.

We have, however, an instance which comes near making up the missing link connecting the cattle breeders with the unions, in shape of a genuine collegium faenariorum,³⁴ or union of mowers who prepared the hay for the cattle and sheep. The inscriptions, of which there are several, are the result of the labors of Gruter, one of the most learned and reliable archæologists, who is constantly quoted and consulted by both Mommsen and Orelli. But the discovery of a union of mowers which once existed at a fashionable watering place like the Puteoli, where this was found, does not sufficiently attest. Orelli supplies the gap with several other unions of hay-makers.³⁵

³¹ See chapters on Spartacus, Emus, Athenion and Aristonicus.

³² See Histoire des Classes Ouvrières, chap. xii.

³³ Don. Cl. 9, n. 3 and 20.

³⁴ Gruter, Inscriptiones Antiquæ Totius Orbis Romanorum, 175, 9.

³⁵ Orelli, Inscriptionum Latinarum Collectio, Nos. 45, 4, 187 which is Gruter's, and No. 4, 194 which is Gruter's inscription 264.

CHAPTER XVI.

TRADE UNIONS.

THE GREAT TRADES VICTUALING SYSTEM.

How ROME WAS FED—Unions of Fishermen—Discovery of a Strange Inscription at Pompeii, Proving the Political Power and Organization of the Workingmen and Women's Unions—Female Suffrage in Italy—The Fish Salters—Wine Smokers—Union of Spicemen—The Game-Hunters' Organizations—Unions of Amphitheatre-Sweepers—Unions of Wagoners, Ox-Drivers, Muleteers, Cooks, Weighers, Tasters and Milkmen—The Cooking Utensil-Makers—Unions of Stewards—Old Familiar Latin Names, with Familiar English Meanings Reproduced—Gaius and the Twelve Tables—Numerous Notes with References to Archæological Collections and to Histories Giving Pages and many Necessary Renderings, of the Obscure Curiosities Described.

UNIONS of fisherman, piscatores,¹ existed in numbers at Rome, Ostia, Pisæ and other points on the sea and the mouths of the Italian streams. Considering the fact that fish were in high regard with the wealthy people, the fishing business was extensive. An account of a union of the piscicapii, published in the Wiener Jahrbücher,² causes Orelli to remark that before elections for the ædiles and duumvirs in the municipal cities, the unions furnished members to be voted for as candidates to the municipal offices; and what is more strange, women, if it happened that there were any thought proper for the places. The inscription which records this fact was found among the ruins of Pompeii.

¹ Orell., Scholæ Artificum et Opificum, No. 4,115. The inscription of this pair of trade unions—the fishermen and divers—reads: "Ti. Claudio Esquil Severo decuriali lictori, patrono corporis piscatorum et urinator. QQ. III. eiusdem corporis ob merita eius quod hic primus statuas duas, unam Antonini Aug. domini N. aliam Iul Augustæ dominae nostr. S. P. P. una cum Claudio Pontiano filio suo eq. Rom. et hoc amplius eidem corpori donaverit HS. X. Milia N. ut ex usuris eorum quodannis natali suo xvi. kal. Febr. sportulae viritim dividantur præsertim cum navigatio scapharum diligentia eius adquisita et confirmata sit. ex decreto ordinis corporis piscatorum et urinatorum totius alv Tiber quibus ex SC. coire licet S. P. P.—Romae. Grut. 391, 1.

² XX. p. 12-15, des Weiner Jahrbuchs,

The discovery of this ancient city has been of incalculable value to the students of sociology, in affording modern science an opportunity to compare ancient with modern life placed in juxtaposition. It brings to our vision in realistic form, such as no human being can for an instant doubt, the social and political life and habits of a great people concerning which the surface historiographers have been profoundly, painfully silent! Who can doubt the veracity of words inscribed on a tablet of marble, scrawled upon a wall and having been, perhaps, already a hundred years or more in use, and at last, in the awful eruption of Vesuvius, at whose foot it stood, overwhelmed, buried and lost to view under a thick stratum of lava for one thousand seven hundred years; then all at once dug out, delivered and held up to the gaze of men now living, fresh as though just from the chisel of the artefer signorum who graved it for his brother unionist? Yet there it stands, its own monument for our blazing enlightenment to decipher. In modern political English it reads like some very cranky caucus slate of a New York ward Tammany club: Freely translated the inscription reads as follows:

(a) "Phoebus, together with his buyers, asks the people to vote for Holcon, who was formerly president of the union and for C. G. Rufus—two men nominated by us." (Meaning two of our men.)

(b) "Licinius Roman nominates and calls for the ballots istituents in favor of Julius Polybius for superintendent of public works."

"The members of the fishermen's union (nominate) choice of Popidius Rufus, for member of the board of public works."

"The international gold workers association of the f Pompeii demand for member of the board of public works, Cuspis Pansa."

"Sema, with her boys, ask that you work with a will in election and secure success, for the office of magistrate, to Julius Simple. He is a man in the fullest sense of the word; a faithful servant of the people of Pompeii; a good man; worthy of assuming public affairs."

(f) "Verna, the home-born, with her pupils in all right, and good faith, put Miss or Mrs. Capella³ to the front for a seat in the board of magistrates."

(g) "It is worthy of you that you work for P. Popid for member of the board of public works, with might and will."

(h) "Fortune (probably a female member) desires the election of Marcellus."

This is all very simple and homely. But it must be clear to every one that such talk was confined to those who were federated together and intimately acquainted with one another; not that we would arbitrarily construe the vernacular of a Roman municipal town, but there is a peculiarly quaint air of familiarity which savors so remarkably of what is taking place in the unions of our own cities and towns that it seems like a mirroring of the ancient upon modern brotherhoods.⁴

This remarkable find goes far toward clearing up points which otherwise might leave doubts upon our statements.

Orelli himself expresses surprise, especially upon the phases of woman's suffrage.⁵ Whatever may have been the actuating power at the bottom of general elections, it is certainly proved by this inscription that in the labor unions, women had not only accorded right but also a practical hand in securing the choice of their unions toward building up a democracy among the ancients.

³ We read this feminine because the context shows it to be so. Duumvir has no feminine termination and they could not alter the word as a political term.

⁴ The Latin of the inscription is as follows:

(a) "M. Holconium priscum, C. Gaium Rufum Q. Viros, Phœbus cum emptoribus suis rogat." (i. e. eis suffragium fert).

(b) "Iulium Polybium ædilem, Licinius Romans rogat et facit."

(c) "Popidium Rufum Ædilem Piscicapi faciunt."

(d) C. Cuspium Pansam ædilem, Aurifices universi rogant."

(e) Junium Simplicem ædilem, Virum amplissimum, servatorem Populi Pompeiani, virum bonum, dignum republica, omni voluntate faciat, Sema cum pueris rogat."

(f) "Capellam duumvirum juri dicundo omni vel optima voluntate facit Verna cum discentibus."

(g) "P. Popidium Secundum Ædilem Omni Voluntate Facere dignus est."

(h) "Marcellum Fortunata Cupit."

⁵ Orell., Inscriptionum Latinorum Collectio, No. 3,700. "Ante comitia duumviralia et ædilia in Municipiis Collegia, municipes, et, quod maxime mirum, feminas quoque, ut iis, quibus favebant, apud alios suffragarentur, hujuscemodi tabellas publice proposuisse, ex Pompejiorum parietinis nuper compertum est."

In this inscription we have not only a full verification of our conjecture that the trade unions were well organized about the time of the labors of Christ but that they were federated with similar communes all over the known world, in universo and also that they achieved so great a progress as to have actually been voting their own members into municipal offices at or probably long before the earthquake in A. D. 79. This does not, however, by any means show that they were in the majority. We have never claimed this. Far from it. The number of slaves was always far in excess of the freedmen; and then, there always were great numbers of freedmen who would not organize and who were too indolent to work either for themselves or for masters.⁶

In addition to the fish catchers there were numerous craftsmen who made it their business to dress, season and put up the fish in barrels, casks and packages. These were the ancient salarii,⁷ of the Romans. It seems to be an established term. Salarium applies in the inscriptions to the fish salters; although it may apply to the salting of any flesh for food. Used much in early England it differentiated into the word "salary." The salarii curatores should be rendered fish curers,⁸ instead of superintendents of the business of fish salting as Orelli imagines, in at least one case.⁹ We have, in the inscriptions found in different places, evidence enough to settle the question about their being organized into unions. Sometimes they are called corpores, bodies; sometimes collegia,¹⁰ unions. They were all engaged in the vast work of victualing the people.

There were societies of fruit-purveyors of several different sorts. We have already spoken of a queer inscription at Rome, noted by Oderic,¹¹ showing that one Julius Epophra, once a cabinet maker, changed this business to that of apple-man and with his wife Helen made a living near the Roman Circus. They seem to have kept an apple

⁶ Dr. Bücher Aufstände der Unfreien Arbeiter.

⁷ Marini, Atti, 2, p. 294. Corpus salariorum. Orell., Inscriptiones Latinarum Coll., No. 1092.

⁸ This is the origin of the modern word "salary." In England, at other fisheries and salt works, workmen were paid in cakes of salt by the Romans. See Pliny, Nat. Hist., XXXI. 7, and XLI. fin; Dion Cassius, lex. viii. 22, and lii. 23. Digest, 2 lex. 15, tit. 8.

⁹ Orell., Inscr. No. 3,464, note, also No. 1,092.

¹⁰ Supplement to Orelli's Collectio, by G. Henzen, Vol. III, p. 170 of index, uncaption: "Varia collegiorum nomina. The several synonyms are here explained.

¹¹ Oderic, Inscriptiones, p. 74.

stand. So trivial a circumstance would scarcely have been worth the labor of graving upon a tablet of stone to be wondered at by their fellow men 20 centuries afterwards. The more probable solution is that he belonged to the cabinet makers' union, and from infirmity or other disability was pensioned off and allowed to pick up an occasional denarius by selling apples in the open air. In that case the union would naturally put his case on record.

The vinarii,¹² or vine dressers, and the vinitores often brought wagon loads of grapes to the city. We are not informed as to the exact manner of supplying the people with these grapes. They were fruit of a season and were probably disposed of somewhat as at present in any Italian city. Many of the houses of the rich had slaves of their own who went to the open market places and procured these fruits in their season. The fruit of the olive tree was sometimes used in the family.

Rome had its mercatores, wholesale and retail, who always kept a supply of every kind of fruit in season. There was a strong union of the wine dealers vini susceptores legalized in the code of Theodosius;¹³ and they are evidently the same as the vinarii quoted above.

We may class the spice dealers' unions also among the purveyors of fruit; as these people had a strong organization called the collegium aromatoriorum.¹⁴ An inscription proving this, has been discovered at Rome and cited by Muratori.

The lords of the land were often too dainty to eat the common products we have enumerated and were fond of indulging in what they considered the nobler fruits of the chase, venatio. Some 15 inscriptions have been discovered portraying different phases of this sport and its products. At least one genuine union of hunters has been found; the collegium venatorum brought out by Muratori, found in the vicinity of the fortified town of Corfinium of the Peligni and not far from Sulmo. Doubtless there was game in abundance at the time those hunters were there.

It would certainly be interesting to know more than an inscription on a slab of stone can tell, in regard to the exact object of these hunters, away in the wilds of the Apennines; especially as they might have been runaway slaves who, under the protecting shield of some law regulating hunting fraternities, carried on business here.¹⁶ Another inscription cited by Orelli¹⁷ under his "critical observations of Hagenbuch, portrays a commune consisting of a number of persons, some of whose names are given, hunting, apparently for other than live game; perhaps for the ores of copper. It is credited to Cardinali and was found at Velitres. A still more singular one is that cited by Gruter and found at Naples. Orelli places it in his Res Scenica—scenes in nature. Were it not too long we would give its rendering, as it speaks of wild animals and scenes. Singularly enough its words venatione passerum, sparrow hunting, is insisted on by the great master¹⁸ as meaning struthionum, of ostriches. We know that the venator passerum sometimes applies to turbot fishing; and we are inclined to think, notwithstanding the great respect we entertain for this expounder of abbreviations and hieroglyphs in his practices in archæology, that he may be mistaken.

¹² Orell., Inscr. Nos. 3,921, 4,302, 6,430.

¹³ Cod. Theodosii, lib. XVI., tit. IV, leg. 4.

¹⁴ Muratori, Thesaurus Veterum Inscriptionum, 511, 4

Another family or union of hunters; collegium venatorum is given by Gruter,¹⁷ as coming from Monselice which is quoted by this author not as a business union but as a family because the words familia venatoria occur upon the stone. Orelli, however calls it a collegium in his index to Artes et Opificia.

A beautiful specimen of a genuine hunting club, collegium venatorum, was picked up at Beaufort in France¹⁹ which verifies our suspicion, that some of the hunters' unions were escaped slaves who, without losing their organization or parting company, fled to the far distant forests and there established themselves in the new art of hunting, thus maintaining their existence in the wilderness. This is one theory. We shall presently speak of another. The inscription reads rather strangely.¹⁹ There was a union of hunters who used to fight wild beasts in the amphitheatre, or the arena, but who broke away through

¹⁶ Mur., Thesaur., 531, 2.

¹⁷ Orell., No. 4,895.

¹⁸ Gruter, Inscr. Totius Orbis Rom., 434. 6.

¹⁹ Gruter, Inscr. Tot. Orb. 331, 11.

²⁰ Mémoires Présentés à l'Acad., d. b, livre II. p. 399.

conspiracy. It is well-known that gladiators most of whom were slaves were compelled to fight and kill each other or fight and be killed by wild beasts on the sands of the amphitheatre, enacting scenes of the most terrible and bloody character known either to the past or present history of the human race. They often had a horror and sometimes were repelled by their own conscientious scruples, against these ghastly scenes enacted in presence of thousands of spectators shouting, gloating and betting on their bloody exercise of muscle and wit. This seems to have been a union of them who, apparently in good faith, had formed a conspiracy to escape and remain together in the fraternal bond. At any rate this is the opinion of Orelli-Henzen.²⁰ This second theory, then, although somewhat in contradiction to the reading of the inscription quoted, suggests that the "collegium venatorum qui ministerio arenario fungunt," was no other than a union of servants of the ring, a part of whose duties, in addition to what we have mentioned, was to undertake long journeys officially in quest of the wild beasts that were used in the amphitheatres, during the emperors. These fierce beasts are known to have been sought, and highly prized by the spectators who delighted to witness a gladiator fighting an enraged lion, tiger, leopard, wolf or bear. Beaufort is at the foot of the mountains of Savoy where to this day, bears of a large size give the farmers and herdsmen trouble. Wolves also still linger among the great forests of the inaccessible mountain slopes; and although we are not aware of panthers or tigers or any of the largest feline animals being found in modern Italy or France, yet they might have existed there in ancient times. But there was game enough to have attracted the hunters for the great games of Rome.

The archæologists have found as many as five inscriptions of these unions of the arena. On one of them is written "arenæ gladiatorum purgandæ."—A union of gladiators who clean the amphitheatre—giving incontestable evidence of a union of amphitheatre cleaners.²¹ The unionists were not slaves. Slaves had no privileges.

²⁰ "Collegium Venatorum Deensum, qui ministerio arenario fungent. Ded. Ex. decreto soluto voto."

²¹ Orell., Collegia Corpora Sodalicia, No. 7,209. Inscr. Lat. Coll., Vol. III, p. 456. Cf. Mémoires Présenté à l'Académie, Vol. 2, p. 399, 1854.

They were freedmen, and those we mention were chartered and existed according to law.

But whatever might have been the special object of the hunters, their general object was, of course, to supply the table of those who could pay, with the delicacies of the chase. The unions had wagon transports to the stations in the forests, communicating with the cities. The difficulty of taking game must have been very great, considering that gunpowder was not in use. Bows and arrows were used and for the manufacture of such implements they had unions of workingmen making devices for trapping, for archery and harpooning. There being a great demand for them, not only for hunting purposes but for war, these weapons were of the best quality; and archery won a high station in ancient times as an accomplishment.

In the great system of victualing the people of ancient Rome and its almost innumerable provincial towns and cities, some of which were fully as aristocratical and fastidious as the Romans themselves, the teamsters' numerous associations played a no inconsiderable rôle. We find numerous evidences in the inscriptions, that they were at one time organized. There were the ox drivers jumentarii,²³ who worked at the port of Rome conveying grain, oil, wine and other commodities to the storehouses of the weighers' and measurers' association, mensores portuenses.²⁴

These and the unions of muleteers, *coll. mulionum et asinariorum*²⁵ that existed everywhere in Rome and out of it, did most of the work of conveying provisions from producers to consumers. Perhaps, in making this remark we are exaggerating somewhat on the amount of work expected of them. Their system was such that they could have performed it all; but there seems never to have been a time when the trade unions obtained a complete control of this work. The large class of capitalists²⁶ were in constant competition with organized labor and always had a large force of mules or oxen at work. Nor must it be

²³ One was found or observed by Gnuratori, Thesaur. Inscr. 511, 3. The second by Connegietur, Nom. Rat. p. 219. A third by Cardinali, Iscriz. Velét. p. 44, found at Veletri. A fourth, that at Beaufort and a fifth, prob. at Pisa by Marini, XIII. Giorn. di Pisi, p. 25.

²⁴ Orell., Inscr. Lat. Collectio, No. 4,093. Momm. De Coll. et Sodal. Rom. p. 97.

²⁵ Gran. de Cassagn., Hist. des Classes Ouvrières. p. 510, Grut., 462, 1. Orell., Coll. Publica et Privata, No. 7,194.

²⁶ Idem No. 7,206, coll. mulionum et asinariorum.

understood that anything like all the work of any kind, was a great length of time, ever performed by the unions alone. The competition between the unions and the speculators must have raged with activity for at least 200 years, and finally the hatred of the speculating oligarchy went into legislation.

After endless turmoils, among which the unions, championed by Clodius, not only restored their old rights of organizations but gained many more, the struggle culminated in Cæsar suppressing nearly all of them. But the unionists were strong and influential and in course of time, after the death of Cicero, Cæsar and other enemies, they reassumed most of their fallen power. Nothing was able to grind them out entirely.

History gives us little in regard to the methods by which the armies of the ever victorious Romans were supplied with provisions. If there is any mention by historians of a union or association of sutlers who made it their business to supply the armies stationed upon Roman territory, we have failed to find it. There are inscriptions, however, which are beginning to reveal a subject pregnant of importance in solving misty queries regarding the phenomenal successes of Roman arms. We have already shown that from the end of Numa's reign the Roman armies were supplied with arms in a great degree by the unions of armorers.

It is here relevant to prove, if possible, that they were also supplied by them with provisions. For at least 500 years the armies used union made wagons, union made swords, union made javelins, bows and arrows, helmets and shields, wore union made shoes, trowsers, hats and coats, and tore down the walls and battlements of their enemies with union made catapults and battering rams. Did they not eat union made bread, union cured meat and drink the delicious wines and beverages prepared by the organized victualers? True, when far away in their foreign conquests the Roman soldiers depended much upon the pillage and plunder of their unfortunate victims; but at home, when the armies were at quarters this question sharply applies. The student of sociology is particularly interested in this subject, because this matter of union labor in supplying the legions goes far in settling the long mooted problem hanging over the decline and fall of Rome.

Rome prospered in peace and in arms, until the glut of conquest changed her statesmen from the wise tolerance of Numa and Servius Tullius to the rapacious slave-holding policy which sought to destroy the unions that made possible her unparalleled success. But when gorged with enormous wealth, she lost her manhood and swine-like fell upon and devoured her own nurslings and friends. The sin struck back upon herself like the fangs of the tortured crotalus and poisoned her own blood with a reacting plague of ingratitude and pollution.

The stones have already revealed to us that there existed unions of victualers who made a business of supplying the armies. They were called collegia castrensiariorum,²⁶ sutlers. We are not informed of the exact relation they had with the armies; whether like our sutlers they hung around the flanks and peddled with the soldiers, or whether they supplied the armies by contract with the senate or consular generals.

In addition to the unions already mentioned we find that the cooks and waiters also had their organization of self-help. They may all be classed as one family or commune, although in some cases at least, the cooks and the waiters were apart. In the inscriptions there are three unions of cooks; one a *collegium coctorum*²⁷ who took charge of the stately business of cookery in the palace of Augustus Cæsar, at Rome. Another is mentioned on the slab as cocus,²⁸ a cook which was found at Rome and is cited by Marini,²⁹ and the third also speaks of a man who was an Alban cook, evidently president of the society. It was found on the cite of the ancient city of Alba.

Mommsen cites the *collegium praegustatorum*³⁰ mentioned by Gruter as a genuine trade union of waiters, who, as this designation implies, were foretasters as well as waiters. The rich in Rome were ever beset with fears of being poisoned. They were obliged to have their food tasted

²⁶ See Bücher, Aufstände der Unfreien Arbeiter, pp. 3-16. Geldoligarchie, Pauperismus, Sklaventhum.

²⁷ Orell., Nos. 7,189, 6,844 and elsewhere. Also Gruter, Inscriptiones Antiquae Totius Orbis Romanorum, 649, 5, and several others.

²⁸ Cardinali, Dipl. 410.

²⁹ Marini, Atti, 2, p. 610.

³⁰ Romanelli, Topog. I, 3, p. 213.

³¹ Grut., Inscr. Antiqu., 581, 13.

³² Momms., De. Coll. et Sodal. Rom., p. 78, note 25.

of by the waiter in their presence. If the waiter ate it with impunity they need have no fears. The waiters being in constant communication with the cooks were supposed to know all the dangerous designs that might originate among the kitchen people, to be consummated in the dining rooms; and were thus held responsible for the honesty of both themselves and the cooks. They were required to taste the milk they served to the gentry direct from the jugs or pots, ampullae of the milk men, or the collegium lacticariorum a milkman's union mentioned by Mommsen²¹ as a corpus or labor union. This interlinking of many trades, whose sympathies and contact sometimes fitted them for carrying out cunningly concocted plots with the waiter thus became practically a sort of key to the treachery. Even the manufacturers of these milk jars had unions, one of which, in the collection of Gruter was found inscribed on a slab of slate or stone discovered at Narbonne.²²

A stone has been dug up bearing the inscription collegium vasulariorum. It exhibits the relics of a union of manufacturers of cooking utensils. Most of their productions were of copper or bronze. The vascula were of various shapes; spits, ladles, cups, bowls, soup spoons and many other implements of cookery. Hammer work with the ancient artisans was a fine art. Sometimes the best workmen, if not slaves, had organizations, which were called the malleatores, hammerers and are mentioned by Orelli as inscribed on a stone.²³

There also were the basket makers' unions the products of whom, sportulæ, figure in the decree of laws governing sacred unions as found in the Roman temple of Barberinis and given in full by Orelli in No. 2,417 of his great collection, which is in itself a curiosity. Other dishes used by the cooks were two-eared flagons or flasks for wine and other liquors, amphoræ, besides a number of others, for nearly all of which we have proof of unions having existed, who conducted their manufacture.

Finally the tricliniarchs or stewards who had the supreme charge of kitchen and dining room. Their name was derived from the celebrated triclinium or dining-couch of the ancients. It was a seat, generally cushioned, which extended around three sides of the table, upon which people did not sit, but reclined—a practice so demonstrative of exuberant luxury, if not of lasciviousness that it was abolished as one of the abominations by the Christians and seems to have completely disappeared from the earth. There is extant at least one monument giving clear evidence of a society of this kind, called in the inscription “tricliniarum socii.” It is in the museum of Rome and bears a very queer, unpolished style of Latin.

²¹ Gruter, Inscriptiones Totius Orbis Romanorum, 648. 10.

²² Orelli, Inscriptionum Latinorum Collectio, No. 3,229.

²³ Fabrett, p. 724. 443.

²⁴ Fabett, 449, 59,

CHAPTER XVII.

INDUSTRIAL COMMUNES

AMUSEMENTS OF OLD. UNIONS OF PLAYERS.

THE COLLEGIA SCÆNICORUM—Unions of Mimics—Horrible Mimic Performances in Sicily—Bloody Origin of Wakes—Unions of Dancers, Trumpeters, Bagpipers, and Hornblowers—The Flute-Players—Roman Games—Unions of Circus Performers—Of Gladiators—Of Actors—Murdering Robust Wrestlers for Holiday Pastimes—Unions of Fortune-tellers—Proofs in the Inscriptions—Ferocious Gladiatorial Scenes between the Workingmen and Tigers, Lions, Bears, and Other Wild Beasts made compulsory by Roman Law.

THE Greeks and Romans are known to have given at an early period much attention to amusements, in which it appears there was a larger admixture of the lowly, with the noble class than occurred in other pursuits. The theatre with the Greeks, was quite a democratic affair. The earliest theatres were rude; but during the heroic ages immense buildings were constructed. That of Megapolis in Arcadia was of gigantic size. Their size was such that roofs were out of the question, and people sat on stone seats for from four to eight hours in daytime exposed to sun and rain, during the performances, listening to, and bound up in enthusiastic delight over the inimitable sallies of Aristophanes in the "Babylonians," satyring the tyrant Cleon, or thrilled by the sublime grandeur of tragedy and mimic of Sophocles and Euripides at Athens. Some of the great theatres were capable of holding 60,000 spectators. The great theatre at Ephesus was 660 feet in diameter and one in Syracuse 440 feet. An immense wooden theatre, built by Scaurus at Rome, 55 years before Christ, and at the moment when intolerance to the labor unions and profligacy among the grandees were beginning to crumble the proud Romans into demoralization and decay, was capable of accommodating 80,000 people.

We find no fewer than six genuine trade unions; called, on the stones, collegia scaenicorum.¹ They are coeval with the age of the Roman theatres. Their members of course, fared better than the gladiators,² another class who contributed to the Roman pastimes; but they were hard-worked people and all belonged to the proletaries.

We shall bring to view as illustrative of our object, principally the Roman life in this section of the ancient trade unions, not because we are wanting of archæological specimens; for there are very many profoundly interesting relics of the life of ancient labor now being discovered among the ruins of the Greeks. Renan, Wescher, Foucart and Böckh have eloquently told the story and the solemn silence of crumbling marbles, like skeletons seem to be speaking in incoherent phrase of a day when the whole Greek world was ablaze with labor communes, whose secrecy was suggestive of a smouldering social volcano. But if we gave them all it would make this work tediously voluminous. Besides, the inscriptions in the Latin tongue seem to bring the matter under investigation more conspicuously before us, not only because they are topographically less remote but because the language in which they come to us is smoother and more intelligible to the readers of the western world.

In the Wiener Jahrbuch for 1829 there appeared a deciphering of an inscription on a plate of bronze containing an epitaph of the president of a union of mimic actors. It is written in the second person. He had lived to be nearly a hundred years old; had never aspired above his fellows and had died bidding them farewell. It is in the Museum at Pesth. Several others have been found in Austrian territory. Orelli³ describes several anaglyphs in stone and metal composition, which have withstood the erosions of nature fully 2,000 years. In the Res Scaenica and Ludi, one is quoted from Muratori,⁴ bearing uncertain evidence that it was a union of histrionic artists. It was from Præneste. Two remarkable tablets bearing record of the year 112 A. D. are noted by Gorius.⁵ They were preserved in the museum at Florence, and unless recently removed, are there still. Upon these slabs are inscribed the names of soldiers of the seven Roman cohorts, of the prætorian force of Misenum ever on the alert conducting the scenic plays. Claudius Gnorimus is being made an aedile or superintendent of public works by the battalion; plays are going on by the acting comrades with their buffoons. Among all these are to be observed: 1st. The head mimic actor; 2d. The mimic Greek leaders; 3d. The clowns; 4th. The Greek clowns; 5th. The Greek actors; 6th. The jesting dandies; 7th. A working-man. All the names of the soldiers are given in the vocative case. Consequently the inscription is too long to be given entire in any work which we have seen. It portrays the kind of military theatrical scene which used to be enacted 200 years after the beginning of the Christian era, or about 1,700 years ago and of course, much earlier.⁶ Another inscription appears among the Res Scaenica in Orelli's catalogue which still more clearly represents a mutually protective union of actors. It was found at the French city of Vienne, a few miles from Lyons, on the Rhone, by Millin.⁷ It is also very ancient and shows that in that far off country of the Allobroges there was a great population long before Cæsar's invasion.

¹ One found at Wasserstadt, Aquæmucum, a suburb of Buda, by Labus and published at Milan, 1827 reads: "Genio Collegio Scæniariorum Felan, Secundus Monitor Decreto Decurionum.

² Chapter xii., Spartacus, int.

³ Orelli, Inscriptionum Latinorum Collectio, in his Collegia Corpora, Sodalicia No. 7,183. Vol. III, Henzen.

Although we are endeavoring to give the facts consec-

⁴ Muratori, Thesaur., 659, 1; Gruter, Inscr. Tot. Orb. Rom., 330, 3.

⁵ Cf. Etruscan Inscr., I, p. 125 and II, p. 447 and Mur., 986-887.

⁶ Consult Orellius, Inscriptionum Latinarum Collectio, No. 2,608. Muratori, Thesaur., 886-7. Gorius Etr., I, p. 128. "Memorabiles sunt tabulae anni p. Chr. 212, duae a Gorio Etr. 1. p. 125. (2,447). et Mur. 886 et 887 editae, Florentiae nunc adsertae, in quibus referuntur nomina militum ex Cohortibus VII. Vigilum et Classis prætoriae Misenatis, qui Ludos scenicos egerunt, quum Claudius Gnorimus aedilis factus esset a vexillatione, ludosque ederet, 'agentibus commilitonibus cum suis acroamatibus.' In his notandi: 1. Archimimus. 2. Archimimi Graeci. 3. Stupidi. 4. Stupidi Graeci. 5. Scaenici Graeci. 6. Scurra. 7. Operarius. Omnia militum nomina vocativo efferuntur." For more on the vexillum, red flag, and vexillatio, consult our chapter on the ancient red flag of the workingman.

⁷ Voyage, 2, p. 21.

utively, we shall here be compelled, for want of data, to mention in an anacoluthical manner, some of the most interesting of these unions known to have existed coeval with those times, or approximately so.

The communiones mimorum, one of which⁸ was discovered in the ruins of the theatre Bovillensis, and others in great numbers in Greece⁹ and elsewhere, were unions of mimic actors. They constituted an order by themselves. It appears that they marched around in the cities and took from their friends and the public whatever gifts were offered. We mention these data to exhibit to our readers the colossal scale on which amusements were conducted, that the mind may be prepared to comprehend the vast amount of labor of the lowly, which the evolutions of this business entailed.

Following up our scheme of inquiry into the dark chasms and gaps of history, from a standpoint of sociological investigation, our point of intensest interest is the question whether these purveyors of pastimes were organized. Of this there is abundance of evidence in the inscriptions. In the catalogue of the archæologist Orelli, there appear no less than 12 tolerably well preserved slabs which show not less than a hundred unions!

At Rome there is an inscription, much broken and defaced by time and neglect,¹⁰ which bears positive proof that the theatre players were not only organized but that they, like the gladiators belonged to the plebeian stock. Caput VI., of Orelli's work, headed Ludi, Res Scaenica et cet., has no less than 116 inscriptions, a large number of which are seen at a glance to be either genuine unions or corporate communes. But as some of these unions were those of gladiators, we reserve their description for that more tragical and brutal class of amusement.

A very remarkable mimic performance for enjoyment was once in vogue during the insurrection of the Sicilian slaves B. C. 143-134. It may not be generally known that in addition to accredited kings and tyrants of Sicily there once reigned a king of the slaves. The extraordinary history of king Eunus is so interesting and so replete with passages which enlighten the student of sociology on points that we have reserved for it a separate chapter as a special illustration of our theme.¹¹ It is enough here to bring forward the episode alluded to in evidence of the fact that in ancient times theatrical performances were sometimes conducted in presence of enemies whereby to tantalize and to wreak revenge. The Sicilian capitalists, landlords and slaveholders had for a long time been growing niggardly and cruel. It was a common thing for a slave master owning from 500 to 1,000 slaves, to call their poor little children together precisely as the herder calls his swine, and feed them nuts, pods and dried figs¹² because the helpless, enslaved and horribly cruelized beings were considered no better than hogs. One Polias, an enormously wealthy Agrigentine not only thus abused his slaves but often whipped large numbers of them at the post at night, to prepare them for obedience the following day. Damophilus, who owned 500 slaves at Enna in Sicily, was another extremely rich planter. He starved his human chattels, while at the same time driving them beyond their powers. One day several of them ventured to ask him for more clothing; for the place is many feet above the sea and chilly during some seasons of the year. Their supplication though given in a respectful manner was treated not only with refusal but with a severe castigation. His wife, Megallis, was, if possible, the most heartless and brutal of the two. She, with her own hand stabbed and whipped to death several of her female slaves, first torturing them with her knife and her stiletto or needle.¹³ Unable to endure their inhuman tortures the infuriated slaves suddenly arose in rebellion and seizing their tormentors murdered them in great numbers. Damophilus was bludgeoned in the theatre of Enna in presence of his wife, Megallis. A council was held on her case, before her husband's dead body, in the theatre. Our authority does not establish that the mimic performance was gone through with during the wild gloatings of that bloody night; but no doubt the tables were turned upon the trembling millionaires who before were wont to shout with almost equal savagery at the mutual murder of their myrmidons acting as their slaves. The result of the trial of Megallis, was her condemnation and sentence to death. She was dragged to a rock and plunged headlong into the hideous abyss by the women themselves. Their daughter, a tender girl who had many times remonstrated against her mother's cruelty, was treated with respectful courtesy, guarded from danger and under escort sent to a place of safety. This uprising lasted 10 years; during which time many places were captured by siege. The slaves who, according to history,¹⁴ at length arose to the number of 200,000 in Sicily, inaugurated the system of holding histrionic mimes composed in their own rude vehicles of thought and represented by performers who could best reproduce, in presence of their previous tormentors, scenes which they and their children had suffered when they were chattels. In this manner they doubtless wreaked a rude and gloating satisfaction too malignant for true humanity, but certainly not surprising, considering their former misery.¹⁵

⁸ Orell., Inscr., No. 2,625, also Nos. 4,094, 4,101.

⁹ Mommsen, De Collegiis et Sodaliciis Romanorum, p. 83. "Communia mimorum Romanorum, et in nomine et in institutis τὰ κοινὰ τῶν περὶ τὸν Διονύσιον τεχνιτῶν referent, quæ apud Græcos ampla et plurima fuerunt." Idem, note 6, "Communia Mimorum multa inveniuntur," etc., etc.

¹⁰ Orell., No. 2,619; Marini, Att. 2, p. 488.

¹¹ See Chap. VII. An account of the Mimic plays at the sieges, pp. 229-230.

¹² See Dr. Bücher, Aufstände der Unfreien Arbeiter, p. 63-64, quoting Stobæus on Florus, LXII, 48. We have also in many places given quotations proving this by other authors. See index, Food of the Slaves and Freedmen.

¹³ Consult chapter ix On Eunus, and the first Sicilian war, where quotations explaining these brutalities, taken from the fragments of Diodorus, are given, together with excerpts from Bücher and others.

Spartacus, the celebrated gladiator, after the battle of Picenum, when he held in his hands the officers and men of the Roman army as prisoners of war, although a humane and kind-hearted general, delighted his soldiers by compelling those proud and high-born gentiles to re-enact upon the field of battle and in honor of the manes of Crixus their fallen hero, the same gladiatorial scenes which he and his comrades when slaves, were destined to perform on the arena. In the captive's hand was put the gladium and in the humiliating garb of an ergastularius, or convict, condemned to fight in the mock amphitheatre and for his audience the vast army of victorious rebel slaves and gladiators, many a haughty Roman knight with his unspeakable contempt for the very condition of slavery, was forced to make the runs and re-enact the bloody work it had been the now victorious rebels' own undignified misfortune to perform upon the Roman sands. Surely, the knights of Lentulus, Poplicola and the other captured soldiers could now have a practical insight into the causes of the great insurrection, when, under stinging urgents of their mock scholae praeceptores, they punched each other, to the music of jeer and of derision from 70,000 vengeance-wreaking infuriates!

¹⁴ For all known particulars of this great servile war, see Bücher, Aufstände der Unfreien Arbeiter.

¹⁵ Bücher, Aufst., S. 66-67. Diod. XXXIV., frag. 34. Lüders, Die Dionysischen Künstler, pp. 105-131, where are explained the numerous theatrical habits to which the Greek artisans were addicted.

Wakes¹⁶ held over the deceased bodies of friends are not of Christian origin but of a much higher Pagan antiquity. Again, where history is silent, the inscriptions—those whispering chroniclers like grinning skeletons of the murdered—survive to lisp their testimony before our courts of science. This subject of the origin and practice of holding wakes, supposed by some to belong to the Christianized races, is really to be sought among the stones which tell the savage tales of haughty masters' funeral feasts whereat poor workingmen were forced to fight as gladiators; and when they fell by mutually inflicted gashes, were buried beside the great dead hero with the object of remaining guard to him as they had done in life. This is the true origin of wakes. They were originally, extremely bloody, and should be classed among other specimens of moribund or fading heathen customs, that are gradually disappearing from the earth.

Scholars reading the Latin classics, are sometimes puzzled to comprehend the reason why Cicero, Suetonius, Florus and the rest, so unexceptionally speak of the dancer, saltator; the female dancer, saltatrix, and the little girl dancer, saltatricula, with a species of contumely. Of everything not human, however humble, they could speak in praise. Their favorite horses, dogs, cats, even cows could earn a good word and a caress; and all things germane to their household were worthy of a feeling thought. But it is a seemingly strange fact that dancers who worked so hard to amuse the ancients, get only a reproachful mention.

Among amusements it may be best to class the various kinds of musical instrument players. There was a regular union of the trumpeters, aenatores.¹⁷ Another sort of trumpeter was the buccinator, who played the shepherd's horn which had a long range of sound.¹⁸ These trumpeters also accompanied the army. Usually the horns were crooked. Mommsen who has worked out the evidences in regard to the Roman arrangement of centurians, in accordance with the military notions which distributed the trade unions into squads of tens and hundreds, thinks that another trumpeter, the *liticen*¹⁹ also had his union, probably a mutually protective association like the musicians' unions of the present time. The liticenes, were clarion blowers and their music was shrill and exciting. Still another kind of trumpeters were the *tubicenes*²⁰ who are likewise known to have been an organized profession or trade. They played the tuba. It is difficult to understand how a separate society was necessary for each instrument. If there were a number of different instruments in each, corresponding to a band of music organized for self-support, as in our times, it would not appear remarkable.

¹⁶ Friedländer, Darstellungen aus der Sittengeschichte Roms. II, 16.

The union of *scabillarii*²¹ does not appear so inconsistent; since the ancient scabellum was an awkward instrument played upon by the feet, while very probably the hands were also employed thrumming another instrument whose harmonies combined, made a band of themselves. The bagpipe is known to be an ancient instrument—so old that its invention is ascribed to a god of the mythical antiquity. Whether the old tibia utricularis was the identical bagpipe of the Scotch Highlanders is a question; but judging from the derivation of the word there is a strong reason to suppose that no great change has taken place in its construction. The bagpipers had an association called the *collegium utricularium*²² and there are several inscriptions to that effect. In addition to the one found by Donati, we have one described in Gruter's collection and catalogued by Orelli.²³ It was found at Lyons. It is something like an epitaph and the work bears the marks of having been dedicated to the name of the president, mag-

¹⁷ Of this we have assurance in the work of Gruter, Inscriptiones Totius Orbis Romani, No. 261, 4; a marble slab giving unmistakable evidence.

¹⁸ Idem, 1, 116, 4.

¹⁹ Orelli, Inscr., No. 4, 105.

²⁰ Idem, Nos. 2, 448 and 1, 803 both were collegia or unions.

²¹ Orelli, Inscr. 4, 117; 2, 643.

²² Orelli, Nos. 4, 119, 4, 120, 4, 121, all were unions, also Donati, 2, p. 470, 9, cites a stone found at Cabelli, which has merited considerable comment. The inscription registers a genuine union.

²³ Orelli, Inscr. Lat. Coll. No. 4, 244. Nos. 9, 208 and 5, 808 are also unions.

ister, of the organization; although, in this case no mention is made of the usual word collegium or corpus.

The cornicen or horn player was another musician²⁴ who is found mentioned on the same marble with a liticen at Rome. But the music of the horn blowers and that of the clarion players was so similar that it may, in this case, be a confusion of the two in one.

The flute players deserve a more particular mention. Among the Romans they were called tibicenes, and among the Greeks auletrides. In very remote antiquity the latter existed at Athens and other cities of Attica. They were poor girls of lowly origin who went about playing their flutes and earning here and there a little coin, sufficient to keep them from suffering. Some of them were very beautiful; and as this natural accomplishment was sometimes more charming even than their music, there goes up a charge against their character.²⁵ It is now known that these flute players were organized in a trade union or some kind of a labor federation. In order to carry on their business they were required to pay a small tax to the government as a license, which tax was collected by the vectigalarii as stated in our chapter on the customs collectors. This was another union whose members were required by the state to collect the last denarius, even if they had to torture, imprison or sell the poor, impecunious creatures as slaves. It may therefore have happened that a beautiful auletrid, before surrendering her life as a slave and legalized concubine of the wealthy Roman or Athenian who bought her at the shambles, would sometimes procure the inveterate tax money by accepting the best available offers which promised life and liberty.

At Rome a genuine flute players' union, collegium tibicenum Romanorum existed²⁶ during the emperors which was shielded from the repressive laws against organization by being a sacred commune. Probably the girls played sacred music on occasions.²⁷ That there were male members in this commune is certain. The wording of the inscription shows this one name taking the masculine termination. There were also at Athens and the Pi-

²⁴ Idem, No. 4,105.

²⁵ Cf. Sanger's History of Prostitution, chap. iii, p. 46.

²⁶ Reines, pp. 184-187.

²⁷ "Qui sacris publicis præsto sunt." Orell., Inscr. No. 1,823.

ræus many of the aulitrides or Greek flutists who lived under protection of their gallant unions. A study of the excellent work of Guhl and Konor²⁸ will afford the reader much additional knowledge upon the subject of ancient music.

The great ludi cercenses which, although in point of history, treatment of performers and other features, were very different from the gladiatorial style of amusement, so resemble these latter in many other respects that it seems consistent to treat of them as belonging to one variety. The Roman circus was not the only institution of its kind. There was evidently a circus at Lyons. An inscription mentioning a union of players, speaks of the right of organization at Lyons, for all who wish.²⁹

Everything built to entertain amusement seekers among the Romans, whether at Rome, Pompeii or elsewhere, if public, took the amphitheatrical shape. There were numerous race-courses at Rome, some of which were of prodigious extent. The circus Maximus³⁰ was enormous. "According to the latest calculations, in late imperial times, it must have contained 480,000 seats. It is about 21,000 feet long by 400 wide."³¹ It is very old, having been begun by Tarquinius Priscus. These figures are sufficient proof of themselves, that Rome once contained an immense population. Large numbers of slaves were necessary to supply the labor of these enormous public works. The many scenes of hippodromes, chariot-running, foot-racing, of archery, mock manœuvres, and sham battles were observable from a great distance. They thrilled vast audiences.

But the inner life of the poor who were to manage and carry out the innumerable features of those games is a subject which the reader of history learns little. They were all of the lowly class and eked out a living under many difficulties and humiliations; and many of those who were not slaves but existed in the capacity of freedmen, took refuge from abuse and overtoil under the meagre privilege left them to unite in mutual self-aid.

²⁸ Guhl and Koner, Life of the Greeks and Romans, Tr. F. Hueffer, (Lon. Chatto and Windus.)

²⁹ Grut., 431, 1. Inscr. Tot. Orbis Rom.

³⁰ Guhl and Koner, Life of the Greeks and Romans, Tr. pp. 422-428.

³¹ Guhl and Koner, pp. 423-4 note. See fig. 431 note.

But the celebrated gladiatorial amusements are more generally known to us at this day, although the circus performance has outlived them, being yet common on a much smaller scale. There was no mockery about the amphitheatre. The combats were real. We have already spoken of the large traffic in lions, tigers, leopards and other wild animals for the combats. Not only did the Romans pit lion with tiger, panther with bear, lynxes and leopards with serpents, but they matched tigers, lions and serpents of terrible ferocity with men. When at the great games the stock of fierce wild animals was killed off they sent hunters in quest of more. Romanelli²² preserves an inscription which for clearness has been regarded by the archæologists as an object of much value. The inscription commemorates a family (probably a community) of hunters of Pompeii, who procured noble game from the forests, and mentions Popidius Rufus as the manager of the familia gladiatorum.

We have elsewhere seen that there were unions of sweepers of the amphitheatres, collegia arenariorum. They were not required to fight in the arena. They dragged the dead gladiators off the sands, shoveled up the blood, new-sprinkled the floor with sand, sharpened the gladia or swords as well as the javelins and other tools, stood ready to perform any service; even perhaps that of cutting off the heads of vanquished gladiators who heroically, when hors de combat, bleeding and dying with their gaping gashes, impatient of death, bent the head to receive the severing stroke of the broadsword.²³

Marini found two queer inscriptions, graved on one stone, of gladiators who "fell fighting, steel in hand."²⁴

²² Romanelli, Viaggio a Pompei, tome I, p. 82; Marini, Atti, I, p. 165. It is clear that there must have been lions in the forests of Mt. Olympus for Polydamus the wrestler (B. O. 404, see Plato, Bekk. Lond. chap. XII note) killed a huge lion there. Lions are known to have lived in Germany and hyenas in Eng. See Buckland, Reliquæ Diluvianæ, Lond., 1822 because their bones are now being found in the Pleistocene caves.

²³ Bulwer Lytton's, Last Days of Pompeii, where these awful scenes are graphically set forth.

²⁴ Marini, Atti, I, p. 165. The modern ages are actively studying out the horrors of the gladiatorial combats. We refer the reader who may doubt as to whether those people fought under the most intense humiliations, to the cuts of Guhl and Koner, pp. 562-3, trans., showing the distressing scenes of these fights with the wild animals, also to Carey, Principles of Political Economy, Part III, p. 128: "The great mass having sunk to barbarous rudeness, bloody gladiatorial games and combats of wild beasts took the place of dramatic representations while the few were becoming more refined and fastidious." To the Iconographiæ Cyclopædia, Division IV, New York, 1851, R. Garrigue. Tafel 15, magnificen-

Inscription No. 2,552 of Orelli's Res Scaenica is designated by him as representing gladiatorial combats in the collisium. It is a horrible thought for an age like this to endure; yet there was a time when killing men for sport was so popular that crowned heads were turned from meditation to convulsions of delight by the sight; and ladies dressed in the costliest attire of fashion could sit for hours bewitched with the whirl, the charge, the lunge of steel and shrieks of pain, the spurt of blood from the wounds of naked men, the roar of lions and screech and growl of tigers, bears and wolves, the murderous hand-to-hand fights of the hoplomachi with heavy swords and the whole swirling, mazy, gory labyrinth of the Roman arena! Surely, forced as we are to admit that such scenes of cruelty really once existed, as it were, among our forefathers, we feel almost constrained to admit that the many thousands of years which had flown before the present era, had produced little better than savages to people the world. Those awful brutalities were the product of the slave system. They could not have taken place where men were free.

The gladiators had several different names. Some were called gladiators, some Mirmillions, some agitators, some pugnatores, some ergastularii, according to their social rank and the kind of weapons with which they were allowed to consummate their murderous tasks. But slaves though they were, they found means to accomplish fraternal unions. That there were unions of gladiators inscriptions exist so plentifully to prove, that the most skeptical can no longer doubt. There are several inscriptions, evidently signs of gladiator brokers,* showing that there were speculators in this species of human flesh. Being slaves and not freedmen, except in cases where they won freedom by killing their adversary, human or wild beast, thus achieving their manumission, they could only with difficulty organize for mutual help.

Orelli, in Res Scaenica, No. 2,066 reproduces the remarkable inscription of Donati, found in Rome, which is acknow-steel engraving of the arena, where are seen fighting men, women, elephants, tigers, lions, panthers and serpents, for the amusements of myriads in the seats above! That they fought naked see Idem Hecht, Section IX, Tafel 7, Vol. II. Plates, showing men killing men.

* Orell., Inscr. 4,197 and 4,247 of Artes et Optificia.

ledged to have served a union. Of itself it is an object of surprise; and has not yet been studied enough to shed all the light that was latent in its curious palæograph. There are recorded in the Res Scaenica of Orelli not less than a dozen genuine trade unions of the gladiatorial art. This of itself makes it conjectural whether there was not some law relative to the organization of slaves.

Fortune-telling was so common that there is a law in the code of Theodosius providing for a union of fortune-tellers, corpus nemesiacorum.²⁶ They had a secret order whose members worshipped the goddess of fortune, called Dea Nemesi. They were something like our clairvoyants; some of them like our psychologists but more nearly resembling the aruspices and diviners of oracles. Such was the superstition among all classes that they were held in high esteem by rich and poor and probably patronized a good deal, thus affording an opportunity to combine profit with mysterious wisdom.

There are some great stories connected with superstition. Eunus the slave king of Enna in Sicily was a fortune-teller. The poor downtrodden slaves, crushed to the lowest condition which left breath and animation in their tortured frames, when they heard of his wise sayings—some of which, like those of our weather prophets, came true—and when they were informed by him that he was destined to quit the servile post of waiter in his master's family and assume the royal robes of a monarch, they believed him; and this superstitious credulity actually wrought the fact. He was fortune-teller, fire-eater, prestidigitator and stump speaker; and combined with all this a bluff managerial talent and a rollicking good nature and winsomeness which determined and cast the die to the greatest insurrection known in history unless we except that of Spartacus. If he had no organization at the start he soon effected one. He also showed much shrewd resignation of his prerogatives of kingship when he gave to the terrible Achæos, and the impetuous Cleon the command of the armies. He showed a wisdom akin to revelation when he decided not to take arms personally but to stay in his palace and blow fire out of his mouth, dawdle with the trinkets of his throne and let these generals fight his battles with a soldiery of slaves who believed that every word he uttered was dropped from the Almighty.

²⁶ Nemesciaci, a dea Nemesi, quae eadem est cum bona Fortuna. Cod. Theod. lib. XIV, Nat. ad leg. 2, tit. VII.

Witchcraft and fortune-telling have been twin trades from the earliest times and were well worth organizing for; and as they were intimately allied to the mysteries of early religions the membership had less difficulty in procuring laws exempting them from suppression. But they carried it to intrigue and machination, so that oftentimes it did not restrict itself to simple amusement. It gained a strong foothold upon the solemnity of religion and exercised so powerful a control of men's consciences that the hints and presages of the soothsayer sometimes decided the fortunes of battle.

Great numbers of unions of mimic actors existed among the Greeks and Romans.²⁷ We have especially noticed that part of the ancient world inhabited by the Roman stock of the Indo-European race; but this was merely for the purpose of making the fact perspicuous that the ancient working people had a labor movement and that the freedmen were organized. In Greece, Syria Phoenicia, Gaul, Germany and the regions of the Danube are also found inscriptions and other evidences that once a great trade and labor movement existed covering most of the then Roman world.²⁸

²⁷ Mommsen, De Coll. et Sodal. Romanorum, p. 88, note 6. "Communia membrorum multa inveniuntur."

²⁸ Wallace, Numbers of Mankind, p. 142, makes some remarks which, though written a century ago, are applicable to the study which engages these pages: He says: "As the riches and luxury of the great men in Rome increased so prodigiously, this must have occasioned a vast circulation, and a general plenty of gold and silver; nor was it possible to confine the money to a few hands: however, the necessaries of life continued at a moderate price, and did not rise in their value in proportion to the high rates which were set on the materials of luxury." This shows that yearning, at least for the socialistic system largely prevailed among the ancient lowly.

CHAPTER XVIII.

TRADE UNIONS.

THE ANCIENT CLOTHING-CUTTERS.

HOW THE ANCIENTS WERE CLOTHED—The Unions of Fullers—Of Linen Weavers, Wool-carders, Cloth-combers—Inscriptions as Proof—Later Laws of Theodosius and Justinian Revised—Government Cloth Mills—What was Meant by Public Works—Who managed Manufactures—The Dyers—Old-fashioned Shoes of the Forefathers—How made—Origin of the Crispins—The Furriers' Union—Roman Ladies and Fineries of Fur—The great Ragamuffin Trade—Their Innumerable Unions—Ragpickers of Antiquity—Origin of the Cenciajuole—Organization of the Real Tatterdemalions—Origin of the Gypsies—Hypothesis.

It is quite possible to establish the fact that the clothing trades were organized. Woollen goods in those times were not manufactured in large mills with costly machinery. Weaving was done on small hand looms, and the fulling of cloth was a trade by itself. Cotton was used for tents, theatres and also to some extent for clothing at an early date; yet our limited data will not permit us to state that cotton manufacturers were organized. But the workers in wool had societies, some of which were screened from the restrictions imposed on many other trades, on account of their innocent usefulness. There is a law of the Theodosian code¹ providing for the right or privilege of mutual organization to the fullers, fullones. We consequently have a fullers' union *fullonum sodalicium*² commemorated on a marble slab, found at Spoleto; another, picked up at Falaria, inscribed with letters so well preserved that no hesitation is indulged in by the critics in pronouncing it a genuine trade union of the fullers, as the word "collegium" appears three times and "sodalitium" twice;³ both terms convey the meaning of mutual union or organization; and as both these inscriptions appear to be of the era of the republic, they are probably very old. If, however, the two tablets above cited are not sufficient as evidence of the union of fullers, we have a gem from Pompeii in the form of an inscription of the fullers who worked in some public establishment. These artisans, as Mommsen observed in his disquisition on labor unions, evidently shielded themselves from the severity of the law suppressing the colleges, by having recourse to a certain amount of piety⁴ which they scarcely felt in their hearts. A society of sacred fullers sounds ridiculous!⁵ Yet this inscription commemorating a fraternity, or at any rate, a force of workmen fulling cloth for the use of the people, bears pious words which would incline one to imagine that some of their wages was devoted, like a collection at church, towards defraying the expenses of the holy temples instead of providing for the earners' hungry babes. This inscription is one of the many contributions to ethnological science which the exhumations from Pompeii have produced. Of course then no one can question its greater antiquity than the earthquake of Vesuvius, A. D. 79; and it might have existed many hundreds of years anterior to that event.

¹ Cod. Theod., De Excusationibus Artificum, lib. XIII, tit. IV, lex. 2.

² Murator, Thesaurus Veterum Inscriptionum, 951, 9. Found at Spoleto among the Appenines. It is an inscription in marble. Cult of the union, Minerva.

The linen weavers during the emperors, enjoyed the free right of organization, according to a provision in the codex Theodosii,⁶ and we accordingly have an inscription quoted in Orelli,⁷ of the linen weavers, lintearii, found at Nemausum, by Muratori. But the stone is in a bad condition. It might have been a private sign, in which case it proves nothing to our purpose.⁸

The wool carders, lanarii pectinarii, used to card and ³ Cf. Orellius, Inscriptionum Latinarum Collectio, Nos. 4,056, 4,091, 3,291 all of which were fullers.

⁴ Mommsen, De Collegiis et Sodalitibus Romanorum, Cap. V. passim.

⁵ Vide Orell, Inscr. Lat. Coll., No. 3,291, Opera Publica. "Eumachiae filii ingenii Sacred. pub. Fullones." Pompeii

⁶ Cod. Theod., lib. XXX, 6. 8, 16.

⁷ Orell., Inscr. Latinarum Collectio, No. 4,215 also Cod. Theod., lib. X, 20, 16.

⁸ For further information on linen weavers, see Granier Histoire des Classes Ouvrières, p. 310: "Les principales corporations marchandes de l'empire étaient celles des tisserands, linteones etc."

weave with similar cards and hand-loom as were used by the colonists of the United States. In all probability the teasel was used in dressing and combing the cloth the same as now; since no application of mechanical invention and science has ever superseded the use of the teasel in combing cloth, although new experiments of great ingenuity are constantly being made.

The weavers and carders were also organized. Of this we also have proof in the inscriptions. Gruter found at Brixia⁹ a fragment of a slab on which were engraved a few words signifying that the sodalitium or union had added another emancipated slave to their numbers, either as apprentice or otherwise. The organization was one of wool carders. The same author records several others, one of them discovered in the village of Rummel agri Silvaeducensis.¹⁰ At Rome there were several others discovered.¹¹

Inscription No. 2,303 of Orelli is placed by him among Opera publica, public works, which is very strong evidence that the state farmed out the manufacture of wollen goods to the unions, who produced the goods for the government in its own mills. Did the Roman state own woollen mills? It would be well for political economists to consider this important question before proceeding to accuse the labor movement of this day of making demands which are "unprecedented" in the methods of manufacture and distribution of the means of human life and comfort. The evidences which are coming to light through the labors of archæologists, who dig up, interpret and record the tell-tale palæographs of an ancient civilization are accumulating proof of the conjecture that once in Rome, at Athens and elsewhere, the governments were owners of woollen factories; and that they were run for government by trade unions, watched, curtailed, hampered and restricted of course, by the jealous optimate politicians lest the immense advantages natural to such a method should conduce to the liberty and social emancipation of the proletaries. The student of sociology may dimly discern some obscure light from great writers to the effect that not only the woollen mills were counted as public works but also many other establishments of a nature to supply food, clothing and shelter to the population.

⁹ Gruter, Inscriptiones Totius Orbis Romanorum, 648, 2, 957, 2.

¹⁰ Idem, 957, 2.

¹¹ Idem, 648, 4.

When the linen or wool was carded, spun, woven into cloth and fulled, it was necessary to have it dyed. It is however probable that then, as now, the goods were dyed in the yarn. This required another trade—that of dyers.

There was a class of dyers, those who colored the celebrated purple hues, who were especially provided by law;¹² the blattearii. They enjoyed the free privilege of organizing their numbers and possessed trade unions, being exempt from the restrictions which so curtailed and embarrassed some of the unions of other trades.

Another class of dyers were the murileguli who fished for shells and purple-fish that secreted an ink used for coloring silk and probably other materials. No inscriptions have been discovered that we are aware of which describe them, but frequent mention in the Roman law in connection with the franchise extended to some unions, corroborates the assurance that they possessed organizations. In fact their fraternity was mentioned and provided for in the codes both of Theodosius and of Justinian.¹³ These workmen colored the exquisite red and purple of the ancient red banner.¹⁴

Thus we have the cloth ready for the tailor. The ancients wore a sort of loose cloak or flowing mantle called sagum. It was usually of long wool and colored. Tailors who made them were called *sagarii*¹⁵ and they were organized; but as they were a branch of the tailors' profession there appear no special inscriptions of them except in the lists of epitaphs.¹⁶ There was a union of tailors provided for by a law in the code of Theodosius, under the designation given them, of *gynaeciarii*¹⁷ which is a warping of a Greek word and a Greek custom into the Roman tongue. At Athens the gynaeceum was that portion of any house where the women lived. They also worked there for their masters; and by this we know they were often slaves. But in Rome it served as a manufactory of clothing in addition to being the harem of the lord. Under the emperors there was a man to oversee this work.¹⁸ As the emperor was the head of the

¹² Cod. Theod., De Excusationibus Artificum, lib. XIII, tit. IV, leg. 2.

¹³ Cod. Justiniani, IX, 7.

¹⁴ See chapter on the Ancient Red Flag, infra.

¹⁵ Cod. Theodosii, lib. X, tit. 5, leg. 12, also X, 20.

¹⁶ Orellus, Inscriptionum Latinarum Collectio, Nos. 4,251 and 4,723. Sepulcraltis.

¹⁷ Cod. Theodosii, lib. X, leg. 2, 3, 7 and X, 20, 2.

¹⁸ Cod. Justiniani, lib. XI, 7, 8.

people he was considered the government and his palace like the residence of the president of the United States, was government property; so that it seems to be a fact easily proven that certain manufacturing establishments were carried on by the ancient governments; since it is well known that the spinners', weavers', dyers' and tailors' overseers who were called gynaeciarrii, had shops in the emperors' palaces and conducted the manufacture of mantles, togas and other articles of clothing on quite an extensive scale for the household of his majesty, including family and retinue. These female clothiers worked in the same manner for others of the great gentes or lordly families. This prepares us for a distinct comprehension of the desire of ancient labor to be organized. It lifted the member one step higher than the slave and placed him or her in the co-operative supervision and care of the fraternity. The Roman gynaeciarrius was generally a man who had charge of the workshop.

On account of a misapprehension of this word's true meaning, lexicographers define the gynaeciarrius as an overseer of a harem! This is a cheap way of degrading the character of hundreds and even thousands of poor working women who plied the honest needle wherewith to eke out a wretched living. But it is the inscriptions—a late study—which bring out the original home-meaning, otherwise lost. Not only the code of Theodosius but that of Justinian contain well worded provisions for the organization of tailors into trade unions. This association was taken advantage of by the women as well as their chivalrous male companions in poverty and lowliness and they were only too glad to enjoy the patronage of their emperors, and work in their houses and those of the grandees, under a foreman, doubtless also a member of the union. The gens family thus furnished shop, tools and stock and the workers here performed the work. But family and state were identical terms.

We now come to the shoemakers. If the reader, in admiring the pictures of the ancients, will carefully observe the apparel in which their feet are shod he will notice that the shoe has the form of a sandal; and that it is laced to the foot like a modern half-slipper. That is to say, it is mostly sole; there being very little upper-leather, especially about the instep. This was the principal article of foot clothing manufactured by the ancients for popular use. Italy, Greece, Spain, Phœnicia, Northern Africa, are almost semi-tropical countries. It is the pinching cold of Central Europe that has forced differentiation in the shape of shoes and boots. The Roman sandal, solea, was manufactured in enormous quantities largely, no doubt, by slaves. But as we have positive evidence of unions of shoemakers, solearii, we know that they were also produced by free labor. The archaeologist Marini, found at Rome a beautiful tablet,¹⁹ on which is engraved in unmistakable terms the name of the union and states that it was a collegium saliarium bazeorum. This means that the members manufactured one particular kind of sandal or shoe—the bazea which was of a certain Greek pattern. In the Vatican is another mentioned by various authors,²⁰ which, however, does not so unmistakably represent a trade union. The Crispini, it is well known, were a very powerful trade union of a later date, whose members carried with them a bigoted species of priestcraft. But as their existence is of so curious a character and their organization so secret, we have failed to find any genuine inscriptions. Their identity however has come down to us in history, and marks an era in the Christian religion, connecting it with labor and practically verifying its precepts by its commingling of the nobility with the proletariat, thus leveling all to one plane.

Diocletian was the tyrant who persecuted the early Christians. Under his reign two brothers—noblemen belonging to a gens family—were converted to religion. Their names, as the story goes, were Crispin and Crispinian. For a poor slave or freedman to embrace Christianity was not so much of an offense because he had no recognition, no family; but for a nobleman to forsake the worship of his ancestral manes and tutelary saints, abjure faith in the miraculous gods and goddesses who for unaccounted ages, by sea and land had presided over the destinies of men and had been believed in with an iron bound confidence and a terrorizing authority that left not a shimmering of option wherein to plant an independent thought—such an offender, was thought to deserve the punishment of death! These Crispins, therefore, having thus offended by embracing the new faith, were obliged to fly to Gaul, where, according to vague tradition, they settled at Soissons, preaching by day and shoemaking evenings, until in A. D. 287, they were executed by order of Maximian. They had first founded the order of Crispins which exists to this day. Many centuries afterwards, 1645, Crispins were chosen as the patron saints of a religio-industrial community at Paris—a secret order called the freres cordonniers—brother shoemakers. This secret order has had a varied experience. It was suppressed several times but grew again; and to-day the order of Crispins exists in the United States, and many other countries of the world, as a regular and genuine trade union of shoemakers.

¹⁹ Marini, Atti, I, p. 12

²⁰ See Orelli, Inscriptionum Latinarum Collectio, No. 4,218. Artes et opificia.

There was also a union of soldiers' boot makers, caligarii, spoken of by Lampridius.²¹ The archæologist Gruter²² brought to light an inscription which may serve as proof. It commemorates the existence of a family of shoemakers who made such shoes, sutores caligarii, but is too brief, or at least the section of it which we have seen is too incomplete for a specimen to fix judgment upon. Another stone from Auximum is more elaborate but rendered vague by the endless abbreviations which the Latins seem to have been so fond of.²³

Mommsen gives a long account of the Roman manner of dividing the unions into decurians, centurians²⁴ and other numbers, somewhat in the manner prescribed by king Numa, more than 600 years before Christ. This inscription alluded to refers to the centurians, and the division to which the union was allotted. Of the ordinary shoemakers, sutores, we do not find any inscriptions proving that they possessed trade organizations. Perhaps they were all slaves, as was the case with some trades. There are hopes, however, that more inscriptions may yet be discovered to prove that the sutores had their organization.

In Rome, as at the present time, it was fashionable to wear furs; and we also know that the furriers were organ-

²¹ Lampridius, Alexander Severus, 68.

²² Gruter, Inscriptiones Totius Orbis Romanorum, 649, 1.

²³ Orell., Inscr. Lat. Coll., No. 3,888.

²⁴ Momms., De Coll. et Sedal. Rom., Cap. II, p. 27-32.

ized into trade unions. The furriers were called pelliones. They were classed as innocent, and allowed the privilege of combination by a special clause in the code of Theodosius²⁶ and had numerous unions of the trade. Among other branches of the furriers were the fringe and border makers, limbolarii,²⁷ who trimmed ladies' dresses with furs or costly silk or laces. The limbolarii or fringers were connected with the ladies' head dressers on the one hand and textores and textrices, male and female weavers on the other. That they worked in the head dress or hat business is certain; but we are in the dark about the method and personnel of the hat manufacture for either sex.

A very remarkable and numerous trade union called centonarii, patchworkers and junkmen or ragpickers, crops out everywhere among the inscriptions. Near the ancient town of Come in Curia, Gruter²⁸ observed many queer inscriptions, among which are several which clearly indicate that at this municipium of Rome the rag pickers were numerous enough to get elected into the municipal offices. Indeed this is his own comment upon the matter. There is no ground for doubt about their being genuine trade unions, as the wording of the stone distinctly says: "collegium centonariorum." At Milan, the same great pioneer of the renaissance dragged forth another of these long forgotten witnesses of the ancient mode of living, to shed its light upon social science.²⁹ This led to further investigation, and Fabretti³⁰ from the same field brought out two other tablets of centonarii bearing equally good testimony. The centurian legion is mentioned upon one of them, and by this we are apprised of the fact that the law dividing the unions into tens, hundreds, etc., held good as far away as Milan in the extreme north of Italy.

Another, found at the ancient Mevaniola, is quoted by Orelli.³¹ It is a slab of stone on which is inscribed the name of the president of the association. It is quite evident that these institutions had something to do with manufacture of rough articles of clothing if not also of any and everything they could pick up the makings for. If among all their col-

²⁶ Code Theod., lib. XIII. tit. iv, leg. 2, De Excusationibus Artificum.

²⁷ Orell., Inscr., No. 4,218.

²⁸ Gruter, Inscr. Totius Orbis Romanorum, Nos. 471. 5, 858. 6 and others.

²⁹ Gruter, Inscr. Totius Orbis Rom., 477, 1.

³⁰ Fabretti, Explicatio, p. 73, 72.

³¹ Orell., Inscr., No. 5,122, Collegium centonariorum Municipii Mevaniolæ.

lections of rags picked up in the streets or obtained by beggary or otherwise in their wanderings by day, they found in their culling and sorting, material of mixed colors and qualities sufficient to make a coat, no matter how versicolored and bizarre it looked when finished, they set about cutting, patching and putting together the pieces, and of them creating a garment readily disposed of among the poor slaves and outcasts whose wretched lot it was often to work in sun and storm, heat and cold, without clothing, as naked as the gladiators who fought on the sands of the amphitheatres.

The immense number of inscriptions bearing record of these facts, affords proof of the formidable misery which poor despised humanity were obliged to suffer in ancient days. In proof of the position above stated, we have from Regium in Cisalpine Gaul a splendid stone containing over 100 words showing that the membership was allied to manufacturers, but of what sort is not given; that they had a temple of some kind of their own; and that they took an active part in public affairs by force of their organized numbers.²¹

We are inclined to the opinion that whoever investigates the subject of the ancient ragpickers from the numerous and unmistakable data already at command, will arrive at our conclusion that they were a sort of social jack-at-all-trades, undertaking in poverty, with limited means, and under many checks of social humiliation and contempt, any job that fell in their way by which they could make a living. Muratori exhibits in his enormous folio collection Nos. 563 2 and 564 1, of his Thesaurus,²² two others, found at the town of Sentinum, a place in ancient Umbria, which, on the whole, adds little to the points already given.

In the Neapolitan museum is, or was a collection of bronze statues, statuettes, plaques and tablets, all conveying thoughts valuable to the study of ethnology—the Heraclian or Herculanean museum. Stored there is another interesting tablet of these centonarii or ragpickers. It was found by Fabretti, directly or indirectly, at Patavium.²³ According to Heineck it is very old.²⁴ Another from the ager Co-

²¹ Orell., No. 4,133; Gruter, 1,101, 1 and Murator, 563, 1.

²² Vide Orell., 4,134: "Similia decreta, nec minus verbosa, adulationisque plena."

²³ Fabretti, Explicatio, p. 485, 160.

²⁴ Heineck, Antiqu, p. 236.

mensis, classed by Orelli, among the societies of artisans is equally suggestive.²⁵ It is ascribed to Muratori, and is from Torcellum. Mommsen's great collection²⁶ contains another stone bearing an inscription of an Æsernian rag pickers' organization and Orelli gives a very fine specimen from Brixia, which he arranges with his collegia, corpora et sodalicia.²⁷ One that Orelli mixed up with his Dii Immortales seems to commemorate one of those unions, combining several kinds of labor under one set of rules.²⁸ When the monument was lettered the union had already existed 151 years. It is at Milan.

These things show how dear the union was to freedmen. We have already cited twelve of the evidences of a powerful organization of freedmen on Roman soil. There are over 40 more good specimens in the museums and other collections, and their record is made good for all time in the voluminous catalogues of Archæologists. The great number of inscriptions of the centonarii, or rag and old junk gatherers, in comparison with most other organized trades may be accounted for if we reflect that very many of the ancient lowly obtained their manumission late in life, after they had been worn out in toil, whose products had gone to their masters.

Manumissions were easily obtained at an advanced age because the owner of a man would be glad to free himself from the expense of maintaining him after he became old, decrepit and useless. Doubtless the owner often killed his ultra-aged slaves rather than accord them the boon called liberty to die in possession of. But we may be sure that such was ever the longing for freedom when offered the slave under whatsoever motive that he seldom refused to accept the gift, though its acceptance entailed all the anxieties and dangers of the precarious competitive struggle for existence. Assuming at an advanced age the responsibilities of life, he drifted into any labor, no matter how groveling, and became the junk-man, rag-picker and patch-piecer; and with the mutual aid of his union succeeded in living happier in responsible independence than he was before in his irresponsible thralldom.

A second reason for their large numbers may be, that ²⁵ Orell., Inscr., No. 4070; Mur. Theasaur., 513. 3. See also Orell., No. 4071.

²⁶ Momms., Inscr., No. 5,080.

²⁷ Orell., Inscr., No. 7,201.

²⁸ Orell., Inscr., No. 1702.

many times no work could be found; consequently to obtain enough to live upon they took to picking what others threw away and found that by scouring the streets and alleys they could bring to their rag and junk markets sufficient to relieve the pinch of hunger, and with the otherwise unusable stuff, make fires to cook their food and warm themselves in winter.

The fact that these centonarii are found to have existed not only in Europe but throughout Asia, is a matter deeply suggestive to the student of ethnology. That they had already had their bands, and their bodies or corpora at the dawn of manumission from this primeval state of slavery there seems little doubt. The inscription that we cite from Orrelli's catalogue² shows by its own words—the identical ones engraved in antiquity upon a piece of stone—that the union had existed de facto already 151 years. Further light is suggestively shed here, to the effect that the union had been able, traditionally or otherwise, to count the years of its age with precision.

These seemingly phenomenal things are clear when we come to discover that when the great war antagonism to the growth and influence of or struck backward and overwhelmed the unions have clearly shown by the inscription from Pompeii, were able in some municipalities to elect superintendents of public works, a few were of the provision that they should keep themselves subject to the rules of the ancient religion, should honor the lares of the gentile immortals and preserve their identity and their habitat by an inscription or register of each union in perfect accordance with the law. Provided with this inscription whereon was registered their habitat, the name of the deity they had chosen as their tutelary guardian, and the business which they professed as a means of existence, the law accorded them the right to organize, jus coeundi. But these regulations they must strictly observe; because they made it very convenient for the police whose duty it was to watch over them and report their behavior to senate and tribunes of the people.

Under the more ancient jus coeundi or right of combination into unions of trades and professions, it certainly, as proved by many inscriptions of the period of the emperors of Rome, could not have been obligatory that the unions should chisel out these lithoglyphs, so precious to us now. So when the law came, some of them searched back for their chronology and pedigree and had them inserted with the rest of the inscription. We know from abundant evidence that the oldest societies stood the best chance of escaping suppression. They were especially exempted by law. This exemption was based upon the respect for the laws and traditions of Numa, Solon and Tullius. The new societies, however, were looked upon with distrust; and it logically follows that if a collegium, corpus or sodalitium could prove its age by tracing its record back to a time anterior to the agrarian or servile troubles, it would have an almost certain chance of remaining unmolested.

² Orrelli, Aug., No. 1703, note 2 of explanation: "Colligiti supra scripti anni 151, et quo collegium istud constitutum fuerat."

We have enlarged upon this curious subject of the rag pickers with a view of preparing the mind of the reader with facts in regard to our theory—which we will admit to be original and unique—upon the origin of gypsies.

It is admitted that history has failed to record the origin, life and migrations of the gypsies. Of course everybody agrees both that they are a caste and that they are, so to speak, the pariah dogs of these later days; but everybody, upon reflection, also admits that they always were and still are organized. The fact is, their organization has always been exclusive and severe. Another fact always was and is, namely, that their language is Latin although mixed with Sanscrit and Greek; and this is the most incontrovertible stronghold to our suggestion that gypsies are the still lingering, self-constituted, tribal relics of the archaic children of the great gens families of the Aryan race, both Asiatic and Indo-European.

We suggest that being outcasts of the domus or paternal home through the law of primogeniture, they served for unknown ages as slaves on the paternal estate; and at the dawn of the period of manumissions were among the first to form self-supporting, or mutually protective unions out of which the least qualified, most cunning and romantic never developed, but continued to pick up a living by petty theft, rag, junk and slop-gathering, horse-jockeying and piece-patching, warping their tongues to fit localities, and their ingenuity to all the cunning quibbles which characterize the competitive system. These we conjecture were the centonarii or rag pickers, whose compulsory inscriptions we study with wondering surprise. They are simply the fruit of the cruel condition of ancient society ; and the unique monument their name and shame have built must arrest the gaze of man, imparting to him a mournful lesson as he toils onward to the revolution.

CHAPTER XIX.

TRADE UNIONS.

THE PAGAN AND CHRISTIAN IMAGE-MAKERS.

ORGANIZATIONS OF PEOPLE who worked for the Gods—Big and little God-Smiths—Their Unions object to the New Religion of Christianity because this, originally Repudiating Idolatry, Ruined their Business—Compromise which Originated the Idolatry in the Church of to-day—The Cabatores—Unions of Ivory Workers—Of Bisellarii or Deity-Sedan-Makers—Of Image-makers in Plaster—The Unguentarii or Unions of Perfumemakers—Holy Ointments and the Unions that manufactured them—Etruscan Trinketmakers—Bookbinders—No Proof yet found of their Organization.

DIRECTLY connected with and a component part of the ancient state, particularly that of the Indo-Europeans, was the great subject of the gods, deorum immortalium. This with them was no wild fancy but an institution so closely interwoven in all the affairs of public and private life that no person of patrician birth who could lay claim to a family¹ could possibly, without heresy often punishable with death, disregard or question. The worship of the manes at the domestic altar, and of the penates, the mysterious home of the lares and all the holy immortals was compulsory. All paganism was excessively, tyrannically, inexorably, cruelly, religious. It ignored the whole proletarian class; and most logically, according to its tenets; for they, possessing no family, no property, no paternity, could have no tutelary saint except by proxy and in an eleemosynary way, used by them superficially to flatter conscience,² and in all cases borrowed by them from the grāndees, who sometimes permitted the loan of a family god³ to act the sham of tutelary protector, and this sometimes out of mere contemptuous pity. But this archaic, aristocratic worship was in practice mechanical. Its temples, the work of the proletaries, were massive, often magnificent structures. Idols were numerous, some of them specimens of the finest sculptures the world ever produced. Its altars were solemn, massive and awful; its sepulchres, sarcophagi and mausoleums, striking in the solemnity of their incidents and surroundings; its little images and deities were visitants of every respectable household; its sacerdotal and sacrificial paraphernalia numerous and indispensable and the oracles and shrines of the aruspex and soothsayer had each to be adorned with furniture which best convenienceed the cunning, flattery, superstition and makeshift of priestcraft.

¹ The proletaries or working people had no recognized family. To be born into an ancient family was to belong to a great and noble gens.

All these things required tools to make them and were the product of skill and industry of the proletaries. Great numbers of these emblems of Pagan piety are preserved in the collections; and by them we know how to appreciate the methods of mechanics who produced them.

The cabatores had a union that made images of the greater gods. By this is probably to be understood, the most powerful immortals, Jupiter, Ceres, Vulcan and the like. They had their shops in Rome and Athens. If they were numerous we are without evidence of the fact; although their skill covered a considerable range. The cabator and the imaginifex made images of many kinds but the manner of their operations is obscure. We know more of their extent. The business of the former was to make the less elegant statues, reliefs, and perhaps pictures of the great deities; while the latter busied himself with the manufacture of the household and toy gods for which there was always a steady demand. In this manufacture of deities there was from the most ancient epoch of which we have data, enough demand to keep large numbers of mechanics employed. It grew with the numbers of the human race, and increased as human taste for luxury increased. Belief did not perceptibly change. Socrates, Plato, Aristotle, even Anaxagoras and Diogenes worshiped the immortal gods whose emblems, statuettes, and profiles adorned not only the temples but the residences of all respectable citizens. Such images, liable to accident and decay, had to be replenished or repaired, and the labor required to do this gave the incentive of organization.

² Fustel, Œtê Antique, livre II, passim.

³ Mommsen, De Collegiis et Sodalicis Romanorum, p. 36: "Legibus collegii Dianæ et Antinoi et collegii Esculapii et Hygiæ." Note 73, Idem, p. 76. "In familia Augustali multa collegia opificum fuisse," Idem, p. 10, De Cultu Minervæ "Nantes quidem accepit simulacrum, . . . Nautiarum familia sacra Minervæ retinebat."

We shall show in another chapter, that on the introduction of the Christian faith at Rome in after years, one of the objections most vigorously raised against the new doctrine was, not that it would interfere with them in point of conscience, but that it would interfere adversely to their means of earning bread! It threatened to sap the fountain of economic existence. The early Christians wanted no idols. The image-makers who wrought holy emblems out of wood, brass, gold, pearl and sometimes of amber and the precious gems, gained a living by their trade; and consequently, Christianity, however it might otherwise please their sense of mutual love, of equality, fraternity and freedom, yet so long as it threatened their means of livelihood, in the slightest degree they opposed it with every effort within their reach; whereupon a share of the Pagan idolatry was bargained for, sufficient to restore the manufacture of images and idols. Then working people, always prone to accept, threw away their objections and embraced the new religion in such numbers and with such zeal that the old religion began to dissolve, and in course of a few centuries crumbled to the dust, while the workman's craft of image-making continues to this day.

Of the most celebrated idol manufacturers, Phidias, perhaps stands foremost. Like all proletaries his family is unknown. No blooded historian could taint the noble prestige with a line enlightening mankind upon his pedigree; and writers of his own class, there were none. His superlative genius, however, wrote his history in the exquisite images of Athena, in the great works on the Propylæa of the acropolis and the Parthenon, wrought by his combined imagination and chisel. Ivory and gold entered into this last chryselephantine colossus; and his adornment of Olympia with the statue of Jupiter as a virgin goddess signalized his age by an exhibit of the mechanical in the most exquisite and costly details. Pericles the renowned optimate and politician, stood in astonishment and admiration before this workingman's genius and originality.

Myron, the cotemporary and celebrated rival of Phidias, could sculpture a quoit-player, a cow or a god with equal perfection. His Hercules, his Jupiter and his Minerva were so perfect that Roman warriors in capturing them were captured by them. When, afterwards, Lysippus, Praxiteles, Scopas and a great many others adorned this art with perfection it never had before or since, it became a trade at which many thousands earned a living, Great schools of image-making flourished in Greece and Rome from times long anterior to Phidias. The Etruscans had schools of idol manufacture conducted, as in Greece, by the proletaries or working people. Once when the Romans beat them in battle and at the siege took Volsinii nearly 300 years before Christ, about 2,000 holy images and statues were a part of the trophies of victory. The Etruscans were hard working, faithful people who had trade unions in great numbers. Some of these were image-makers; and they well knew how to live and profit upon the superstitions which thus attached to the Pagan faith.

While Rome produced few image-makers of brilliancy she patronized enormously the manufacture of all sorts of holy trinkets. The household from the earliest times was the true patron, and ladies bought many little imitations of gods and goddesses together with an endless variety of sacerdotal paraphernalia, such as suited their fancy as to merit and price.

Orelli gives us an inscription of a genuine union of the bisellarii, who manufactured the great sacerdotal seat or chair; a splendidly finished and richly upholstered tête à tête for the gods.⁴ There were also signs either of unions or private business of persons working ivory, ebu-

⁴ Inscriptionum Latinarum Collectio, No. 4,137, note 1, also Gruter, Inscriptionum Totius Orbis Romanorum, 12, 8, and Muratori, Thesaurus Veterum Inscriptionum, 544, 1.

rarii. The inscriptions are given by Orelli.⁸ But we have more positive evidence of a trade union of ivory workers in a direct mention of them as such in the Justinian code which provided for them the right to organize and labor in the holy cause.⁹

The evidences indicate that the tectoriolae or little plaster images of which Cicero⁷ and others have made mention, were the work of the albarii.⁸ An inscription found at Rome and published by Gruter,⁹ appears to signify by its reading that the business was managed by one C. Ateius Philadelphus but gives no clue to warrant that he was managing officer of a trade union of the plasterers' craft.

Besides the wonderful chryselphantine ivory workers belonging to the great school of Phidias, already mentioned, there were the eburarii, who, as we have already stated, were fortified by a law in the code of Justinian, and were excepted in the late statutes on trade unions.¹⁰ These craftsmen made little statuettes, symbols, ivory chains, variously shaped charms and talismans propitiatory of the gods. They for this purpose carried on a considerable trade with the Africans and Phœnicians whereby to obtain pure and delicate ivory. Indeed, the superstition inculcated by the ancient religion led to a veritable industry which through many a long century furnished bread to these mechanics and their families.

Orelli,¹¹ gives an inscription of an association or genuine trade union of the gods' bed makers, or pulvinarii.¹² They were organized under the society name of sodalitium which Cicero characterized as low and mean; but we presume that as in this case their calling was to manufacture the elegantly upholstered couches and silk embroidered sleeping furniture of the mighty immortals, the piety and solemnity which enveloped their workshops rescued them from the rigors of the conspiracy laws which Cicero and

⁸ Orell., idem, Nos. 4,180 and 4,302.

⁹ Cod., Justinian, x, 64, 1.

⁷ Cic., Fam., 9, 22, 3.

⁸ Tertulian, De Idololatria, cap. viii. This author, however, admits that besides images placed in the walls, the albarii did several other kinds of plaster work.

⁹ Gruter, Inscr. Tot. Orb., 642, 11.

¹⁰ Orell., Nos. 4,180, 4,302.

¹¹ Inscriptionum Latinarum Collectio, No. 4,061.

¹² We say "genuine" in cases where we find full approval as to their genuineness. Orelli, Fabretti, Muratorius, etc., are high authority

Cæsar instituted for their extinction. Another inscription was registered by Oderic, of these couch makers.¹³ It says that one Julius Epaphra was a fruit seller, formerly pulvinarius who worked at the couch makers' trade furnishing them for the great circus; and Orelli cites Suetonius to show that such seats or couches were common at the games although their usurpation by the grantees did not please.¹⁴

We close our section on the image-makers with the unquentarii or perfumers. The reader by this time begins to see that in reality all these fine things "fit for the gods," which were manufactured by the unions in such quantities, were appropriated and used by the rich who in thus usurping or assuming what was destined for immortals, substituted themselves therefor; and in that way threw a halo of glory around themselves and their great, inapproachable gens families. The whole of it was a sort of self-deification, using political priestcraft to puff their vanity, inflame their egoism, and widen the chasm which forbiddingly yawned between them and the proletarian classes.

These fine things, so pleasing to the sense of feeling and vision were not enough. They also required something to gratify the olfactory sense; and perfumes of the richest kind were manufactured for them. There were unions in considerable numbers who did this work. At Capua before and during the servile war of Spartacus, there were perfumery factories which were celebrated all over Italy. The perfumers can scarcely be called image-makers, but their art completed the category of delicacies and amplified the means of satisfying the voluptuous cravings of the enormously wealthy. Their perfumes were used in the temples, and at the sacrifices. They were esteemed at feasts and were used in dress. At the great circus, and afterwards the colliseum, the reserved seats of the grantees were known by their aroma.

The perfumers were not only workers but also merchants; and necessarily, because they had to carry on a considerable traffic with the east and south to obtain gums, spices, nuts, seeds and other raw material for their products. The perfumers or unguentarii also had similar unions in Athens and Corinth where they carried on a considerable business. There are found quite a number of inscriptions of different kinds of these workmen and their societies. One archæologist cites an inscription found in Rome, upon which there has been some comment made, arising from a disagreement about its exact meaning.¹⁵ Publicius Nicanor, was a perfumer on the Via Sacra, and one Maximus Accensus, was one of the members of the union whose duty was to do up the goods. Most probably it was a union of perfumers chartered under the names of two foremen, or one foreman and one director as was customary in order to comply with the law. Marini¹⁶ cites another inscription showing that these prominent officers were females, or at least one of them. The slab was found in Naples. Orelli¹⁷ has an inscription found by Gruter at Venusia in Lucania, which celebrates the setting free of a bondsman and family, by the father, out of the money obtained as proceeds of the perfumery business. His name was Philargyrus, a perfumer. This was probably a private business of the Augustine period. The marble is broken here, leaving us with this conjecture.

¹³ Oderic, Inscriptiones, p. 74.

¹⁴ "Spectare cum circenses ex pulvinari non placet nobis." Suetonius, Claudius, 4.

All the image-makers and perfumers' trades were countenanced and provided for by King Numa who believed that religion was a thing most proper to cultivate. He further believed that it was impious to wage war; or at any rate, to risk the chances of war lest the sacred temples and alters be desecrated by its ravages. Thus from a high antiquity, and largely out of respect to the memory and works of this king, the image-makers were classed as the futherers of the holy cause and exempted from many of the restrictions and persecutions which in later times became the source of bloodshed.

There was a regular trade society of the pearl fishers, margaritarii,¹⁸ who, it appears, communicated with the ¹⁵ Donati, Roma, Vetus et Recens, p. 327, 51. It is also mentioned by Muratori, Thesaurus, Veterum Inscriptionum.

¹⁶ Atti, 2, p. 516. De Unguentariis.

¹⁷ Orell., 2, 988.

¹⁸ Orell., Inscriptionum Latinarum Collectio, Nos. 1,602, 4,076, 4,218. One of these, No. 4,076 is a genuine trade union. No. 4,218 comes under the title of Artes et Opifera, leaving it questionable as to its having been a private business.

workshops in the cities, which their labor supplied with pearls in the rough. Diving and scraping in the distant waters for pearls was, at the starting point of this precarious business, a trade which to render successful, needed to be fortified by a federation with the inlayers and other pearl finishers working at home. Much of this pearl was used in decorating the images which the demands of an idolatrous faith places upon the market; and by thus furnishing labor, gave bread to the working people. On a superficial view, the fact that the great artists, such as Phidias, Myron, Polycletus, Alcamenes of the heroic school of Ageladas, or the still more versatile school of a few years later of which Lysippas, Praxiteles and Scopas were the heroes, we do not find the pearl industry to have extensively entered into the composition of the great sculptures. But we must remember first, that the descriptions are defective, and next, that the originals are lost.¹⁹ We know that pearls were used in archaic times. If they entered into the composition of idols—and there seems to be no ground for doubt of this—it must probably have been by inlaying.

Great skill was required in the whole pearl business. Among the Etruscans and Romans the art turned rather toward the trinket manufacture. Many of the little gods of the household, emblems, talismans, mementos and charms were gemmed with pearls. Of course, these things, at this late period, if dug from the ruins, would fail to discover the perishable pearls; because the delicate carbonate crumbles with moisture, neglect and time.

We find a few dim accounts of book-glueurs mixed up with the amanuenses or scribes. They acted the part, so to speak, of the modern printers. These, together with poets, teachers and persons engaged in medicine and surgery, were always, or nearly always, of lowly birth.²⁰

¹⁹ A more thorough ransacking of this subject may bring to light much of value regarding the unions of image-makers who inscribed their record in the Greek tongue.

²⁰ Guhl and Kohner, Life of the Greeks and Romans, p. 526. "Three classes amongst the slaves and freedmen, held a distinguished position by their intellectual accomplishments, viz: the medici, chirurgi and literati." As to the literati, idem, p. 529 we quote as follows: "We have already mentioned the literati, cultivated slaves, generally of Greek origin, who had to copy books or write from dictation. By these slaves manuscripts were copied with astounding celerity, with the aid of abbreviations called, from their inventor, Tiro, a freedman of Cicero, Tironian notes. These copies, sometimes full of mistakes, went to the shops of the bookseller (bibliopola), unless these kept copyists in their own

Glucers, glutinatores, are spoken of by Cicero.²¹ That they were numerous is evident from the large amount of work required of this kind. The great histories of ancient writers were copied times without number and some of them were bound in boards or leather or cloth with much art and taste. It is, however, beyond our power, as yet to discover whether the book-binders possessed a trade organization. The fact that most of the other trades had unions renders it probable that they also were organized, and it is possible that inscriptions may yet be discovered revealing the fact.

shops. Numerous copies were thus produced in little time. The satirical writings of Ovidius, Propertius and Martialis were in everybody's hands, as were also the works of Homer and Virgil, the odes of Horace, and the speeches of Cicero; grammars, anthologies, etc., for schools, were reproduced in the same manner; indeed, the antique book-trade was carried on on a scale hardly surpassed by modern times." Much is taken from Pliny, Natural History, lib. XXIX. intl.

²¹ Cicero, Ad Atticum, liber, IV. c. iv. 1. See also Orell, Inscriptionum Latinarum Collectio, No. 2,925, 4,198. Glutnarius, the inscription is on an elegant tomb inside of a vault, according to Gruter, copied by (Orell, Artes et Opificia, Vol. II, p. 298). See bookbinding, Ed. Bevan. Series of British Manufactory Industries, (Article by Freeman Wood, pp. 70-94).

CHAPTER XX

TRADE UNIONS CONCLUDED.

THE TAX-GATHERERS. FINAL REFLECTIONS.

UNIONS OF COLLECTORS—A Vast Organized System with a Uniform and Harmoniously Working Business—Trade Unions under Government Aid and Security—The Ager Publicus of Rome—True Golden Age of Organized Labor—Government Land—A prodigious Slave System their Enemy—Victims of the Slave System—Premonitions on the Coming of Jesus—Demand by His Teachings for Absolute Equality.

JUDGING from all the records within our reach, it was Numa who first recognized the necessity of regularly organized trades unions for express purposes of purveying goods of every kind, in a systematic manner. He was a strictly business man; and the most important business has ever been that of getting the means of life. In addition to the federated trades there had to be the tax collectors; otherwise the expenses of the government could not be defrayed. For this, there was a set of workmen, whose express business was to traverse city and country with their credentials from the regularly chartered union of the Vectigalaria or tax collectors. There were, at that early time, no such arrangements as now exist, by which the government did its own work of this kind. A labor guild or union did this work. We have evidence showing that the men going on their rounds collecting the taxes, were sometimes severe, even brutal to the poor farmers, forcing them to comply with the requirements of the law.

Of the branches into which king Numa distributed the working people we have already spoken elsewhere, representing them as they appear to us from evidence, through a long vista covering what we, for our own scheme of reasoning, term the golden age because the workmen thrived. Meantime we are well aware that the so-called Golden Age of Rome, is reckoned between the years 250 and 14 before Christ; but this calculation is made by historians of the competitive system, and befits itself to conquest and literature, not to the progress of social prosperity. It actually begins about the time this social and economical prosperity had reached its zenith. We cannot admit the Golden Age of Rome to have begun at so late a date. From a well sought point of view of sociology this era began with the recognition, by the law of Numa, of the right of free organization; and the laborers' methodical assumption of the business of supplying the people with the means of life. This was the true golden age of Rome; and as it also covers the largest part of the era ordinarily admitted to have been the golden age, including the great period of Roman conquest and the splendid era of literature, it only varies in having commenced 670, instead of 250 years before Christ.

If it was necessary for the scheme of Numa to have the public lands formed by the guilds or societies of practical agriculture it was also as necessary for him to institute some reliable means of collecting the fruits of this labor and distributing them among those whom the law recognized as the true owners. We have had abundant evidence that among the ancient Indo-European Aryans, no persons except those born to an inheritance possessed the right of owning the public domain. Even the patricians who were the privileged class, and the makers of the laws, did not, until a comparatively late date, attempt to get personal possession of the ager publicus of Italy. The plebeians who were the only workers, never owned any land. The state owned the land and the proletaries worked it. The fruits of the lands had to be brought to the people. What is meant by the state ownership, in ancient law, is citizen ownership—the state holding it in common for the citizens. But who were the citizens? It certainly was not the working people, who were the outcasts, the descendants of the slaves, or the slaves themselves. They owned nothing and could own nothing. But their function was to do the work; and Numa permitted them to organize and do the work socially or in common.

After the harvest the grain had to be distributed among the citizens who, according to the law, were the owners of the land, the state holding it for them in trust. The workers were always obliged to recognize their lowly condition, and were always glad to get enough of what they produced to keep them alive.

The plan instituted whereby to collect these products and distribute them among the privileged citizens and others, was organization of the vectigalarii or collectors of incomes, who did this work through a system of societies. The society had a manager or principal overseer, procurator, and was also supplied with a quaestor or inspector, who was perhaps the chief clerk. Then came sometimes a secretary, a treasurer and foremen and the working hands, all of whom constituted the membership of the union or commune. The old name of the secretary was sometimes set down in the inscriptions found by the antiquaries, as cornicularius,¹ which signified that the secretary had risen to the place by promotion. It appears from the numerous inscriptions cut in stones, that these customs collectors had societies or unions all over the provinces under Roman domination.² At Lyons, after the conquest of Cæsar, there were several of them.³ Their work was to collect the proceeds of the harvests. Others collected the products of the manufactories: others the proceeds of the fisheries. Even the proceeds of the brothels were collected and distributed in money.⁴ All the multiform labor of collecting had to be done, and the state made it obligatory upon the customs-unions to do their work well. This accounts for Granier's⁵ remark

¹ Later an assistant secretary, Cod. Theodosii, VII. 4, 32.

² See Orell., Inscriptionum Collectio, 6, 642. Vectigalia and many others.

³ Boisseau, Inscription de Lyon, VII. 25, p. 272, found one which reads as follows: "Memoriæ Aurelii Cecilianæ præpositus. Vectigalium posuit Epictatus Alumnus—Lugduni." Meaning that Epic the apprentice inscribed the slab to the honor of the director one Aurelius Cecil, in Lyons.

⁴ Sânger, History of Prostitution; Rome, p. 68: "The Prostitulæ (strangers not organized) paid no tax to the state; while their registered rivals (organized meretrices, see p. 66 idem), contributed largely to the municipal treasury." Greece, 48. "Any speculator had a right to set up a dictæron by paying the tax to the state."

⁵ Histoire des Classes Ouvrières, chap. xiv. Ancient Trade Unions and Their Development.

that these customs collectors were sometimes brutal to the poor farmers whose unions failed to garner as much as the law required.⁶ It is evident that the collectors had to put themselves in direct business relation with the union of vectuarii or teamsters; as they more frequently took the produce itself than the money. Their practice was to supply the citizens, not so much with the money these proceeds of labor were worth, but with the proceeds themselves.⁷

The trade unions were recognized by the state and held responsible to the state for their work. If in conveying the grain from the farms to Rome, the wagon was attacked by mountaineer brigands and the goods lost, the citizens, who were the state, held, not the teamsters but the whole union responsible. In almost all cases, however, the produce of the ager publicus was transmitted to Rome by sea.

For instance; a certain quota of the province of Aquitania, or the neighboring province of Lugdunensis, where are found many relics of these societies, is claimed at Rome. Lugdunum or Lyons was connected by water every step of the way to Rome. The society at Lyons sent the grain down the river Rhone by barges to the Mediterranean. At Arles, a ship took it on board and consigned it to Ostia, the mouth of the Tiber and port of Rome. Now the barges of the Tiber had to belong to a union. So there were unions of bargers, caudicarii. The first society guaranteed the safe arrival of the grain as far as the mouths of the Rhone, Ora Rhodani. Here were the ships of another society to further convey it to the port of Rome, so hither it had to be conveyed on board a ship. Thus is seen why the seafaring men also must have an organization; otherwise, if the ship was lost, captain, crew and cargo, there would remain nobody responsible; and the citizens would be the sole sufferers. It became necessary therefore, since the government had jobbed out one part of this business to a commune, that it do the same thing in their case, because the rich citizens who were to be fed by labor, though, personifying government, could legislate or conduct war, could not work; because upon it there was a taint. So the order of the navi- cularii existed; and being chartered by government, was made responsible for the loss of any cargo. When the cargo arrived at Ostia, the mouth of the Tiber, sixteen miles from Rome, it was conveyed to the granaries of the city by the societies of boatmen, known as caudicarii, bargemen, under guarantee, precisely in the same manner as in former cases. Thus for the least possible trouble and with utmost security, the government or non-laboring citizens got the greatest possible amount of produce from the ager publicus, or common land. Yet the people who labored were satisfied and thrived better than they were ever known to thrive under any system, because their industry produced enormously and their strong arms made labor easy, agreeable and safe.

⁶ Dionysius of Halicarnassus, book V. chap. 48, explains the power of the law permitting and furthering these organizations.

⁷ Granier. Histoire des Classes Ouvriers, chap. xiv. Much additional information may be obtained by reading this valuable chapter of M. Granier's work.

Now the customs collectors or vectigalarii were interested in all these details of supply; because the government looked to them directly or indirectly for everything the citizen population had to live upon from year to year.

But the supply of grain, wine, oil and other agricultural products was not all these tax collectors had to attend to. There were many artisan societies. These we have treated separately and in regular order, according to their importance. They all had more or less to do with the tax or customs collectors, with whom they were interlinked in the great social bond. Sometimes, as in the case of the pork butchers union,⁸ there were officers appointed whose business was to go personally, or send, into the stock farm country and collect the tax either in money or in kind. This would, of course, entail an immense amount more labor than that attached to butchery. It would entail the whole business of the drover. Weighing would require much attention, and an inspection of all the various operations of several vocations.

Slabs have been found to the number of 262, bearing inscriptions of the vectigalia, of different dates, ranging mostly from the time of the first Cæsars to that of the emperor Constantine. These 262 include only those registered by Orelli in his work on the Roman Antiquities. Great numbers of those unions probably existed of which no record was kept, and antiquaries of the future may yet reveal more. On the whole these facts regarding inner workings of the ancient human family present a picture of deep interest, revealing as they do a system of industry unique in its method of supplying the great population of Rome at that time containing probably about 2,000,000 inhabitants⁹ and its numerous municipia or provincial cities and town with means of life. The vectigalia evidently covered more of the immense business of those times than the ordinary reader would ascribe to them. Orelli,¹⁰ speaks of iron miners who sometimes interlinked with the mines situated at great distances from the city; yet it would appear by this mention that the miners far away in the mountains and perfectly organized, were in close and systematic, if not happy mutual communication with the forgers' association stationed at Rome.

⁸ Granier, whose researches into these societies and the laws governing them reveal an astonishing versatility and accuracy, says that very many, if not all the commercial trades had officers, whose work was to oversee the customs collections. See idem, pp. 310-315. There was a Boatmen's insurance mentioned by Livy xxiii. cap. 44. Beckmann, Hist. of Inventions, (Bohn) I. p. 284. (Caudicarii).

The most remarkable part of the system was that it was government work; that the work was performed by trade unions instead of isolated individuals as in the competitive system; and that during many centuries through which this system existed, both in war and peace, the ancient working people were prosperous and happy. Of course, this organization does not apply in any form to slaves. This terrible scourge of the human race still existed; but there are strong proofs that the trade unions were at one time making inroads upon the slave system which required care by the masters and slave owners in order to conduct business; whereas the trade union system endorsed by king Numa lifted all the troublesome details and responsibilities from the shoulders of the patricians who regarded individual labor as a disgrace. Labor being a humiliation to the propertied class who managed the government land but did not perform the actual work, it was a matter of convenience for them to have trade unions. The state, then, was their great patron and protector. Rich individual slave owners like Crassus or Cicero or Nicias could job out their slaves' labor to persons of enterprise, but the very pride of their blood prevented them from undertaking any except the noble enterprises of war and politics. There was nobody to compete with the unions and the state became their great employer. But we have seen in our account of strikes and uprisings that human cupidity, taking advantage of the slave system and by means of it, grasping, holding and tilling the ager publicus, finally destroyed the public trade unions.

⁹ Consult Dr. Beloch. Bulletin de Statistique de l'Institut International, tome, I. année 1886, p. 62 sqq. Roma.

¹⁰ Roman antiquities, No. 1,289 vectigalia ferrariorum also ferrifodinaril. See also Mur. 972, 10. The inscr. reads: "D. M. Primonis ferrariariorum vitalis contuber." Found at the mines of Nimes.

That the trade union or social system was good there seems to be no ground for doubt; but the workman being stamped by the old religio-political jealousy of paganism which branded him as a wretch, preventing him from taking political action, whereby to secure and fortify his system, gave the grandees all the advantage because they made the laws. When, therefore, the unions found that they must exercise their political power, which they did in later times, it was too late. They were themselves too deeply tinged with the deadly, unmanly sense that their masters were superior to them by birth. There had been no Christ to boldly declare a new state of things based upon absolute equality by birth and natural rights of all men. Seeing the encroachments upon themselves as well as upon the public lands their sole source of raw material, the trade unions tardily fell into the struggle, learned to wrestle valiantly, suffered a more pronounced hatred of their masters, grew in self-dignity but gradually lost in vested rights, forced up a great social struggle but incurred the deep-rooted hatred of Cicero and Cæsar, grew poorer, more numerous, more secret, vindictive and conniving and wrought up a spirit all over Greece, Rome, Judea and the provinces, which rendered possible the kindling of that marvelous revolution that destroyed the identity of ancient paganism.

But there is one thing our researches fail to discover. We do not find clear and sufficient evidences of a system of agricultural communes. These may have existed. We are in doubt. Everything else was organized. Where is this missing link? Had it existed, would not the great trade union system have grown so complete as to gradually obtain the ascendancy, political as well as industrial and thus been able to realize thousands of years ago, the revolution?

CHAPTER XXI.

ROMANS AND GREEKS.

THE COUNTLESS COMMUNES.

UNIONS OF ROMANS AND GREEKS compared—Miscellaneous Societies of Tradesmen—Shipcarpenters—Boatmen—Vesselmakers—Millers—Organization of the Lupanarii—Of the Ancient Firemen—Description of the Greek Fraternities—The Eranoi and Thiasoi—Strange Mixture of Piety and Business—Trade Unions of Syria and North Palestine—Their Officers—Membership and Influence of Women—Large Numbers of Communes in the Islands of the Eastern Mediterranean—Their Organizations Known and Described From their Inscriptions.

ALL antiquity was at one time a hive of trade unions. Nearly every species of business was organized. Especially was this the case in southern Italy, where Plato found a system of communism extensively prevailing, supposed by some to have been planted there by Pythagoras.¹ The early inhabitants of the Italian peninsula were well acquainted with trade unionism; and traces of it, if not mentioned are discernable in history and this fact stands as the fundamental solution to many of the otherwise incomprehensible things which have puzzled modern historians. Nevertheless the nobility and its laws of primogeniture reigned in circles of politics and power. Plato is known to have visited Italy several times in search of material for his ideal state. He was, however, so much of an aristocrat, or so enslaved by his environments that he signally failed to give the world the benefit of his communistical lucubrations. The nearest he could possibly get to a decent government was to one of bosses, policemen and slaves, and the sociologist of our day is forced to drop Plato with a species of chagrin or disgust. Aristotle did better; but both were aristocrats, enslaved to great men of wealth. Both Solon and Numa, long before them had planted the real, practical government which the world is at this moment following. Though Aristotle could analyze the course the world should and does take, yet he was too Pagan-bound to see beyond the galling bands of slavery.

¹ Drumann, Arbeiter und Communisten in Griechenland und Rom. somewhere remarks that Pythagoras and Numa were not only contemporaries but personal friends. If so, we cannot wonder that Numa befriended the trade unions.

The Fabri navalium, ship carpenters and boat makers, of the Tiber had well regulated unions which were considered among the most respectable of the organizations. These Associations were found along the banks of the navigable rivers and the coasts of the sea on both sides of the peninsula and also in Sicily.

Of the boatmen's unions, collegia naviculariorum, the greater number, according to our evidence, were to be found in the country. There could not have been many boatmen at Rome; but we have a mention, among others, by the great jurist Gaius, who speaks of them in discriminating the right of organization in later times.² The unions of boatmen were naturally confined to the sea shores. We might speak of them as possibly connected directly or indirectly with the lawless boatmen who swarmed the sea from Naples to Syracuse, and whom Plutarch says Spartacus found to be treacherous, without principles and looking only for grain. Even to this day the Mediterranean is lined with them from Gibraltar to Barcelona and thence to Toronto. At Genoa and Nice and on the Baltic, they are still well organized and take advantage of every opportunity to gain a lira by fair means and in all their methods to attain this end are thoroughly sustained by one another, as they enjoy all the mutually assisting quirks known to their union.

The *collegium vasculariorum*³ (metal vessel makers), was, of course, a union of potters; but it appears their art was mostly, if not quite confined to manufacturing vessels in metals. The vascularii were skilled workmen. They often wrought beautiful urns in bronze and other material. Some of the delicately chiseled amphorae having two handles were of their workmanship, although most amphorae were made of potters' clay. Many vessels in gold were the work of their hands. They are known to have realized well by virtue of their trade union; because their patrons were largely the proud gens who were not stingy about the amount of cost, if they could have their æsthetic tastes gratified.

² Gaius, Digest, 1, III. 4, "Item collegia Romæ certa sunt, quorum corpus sanctis coll. atque constitutionibus principalibus confirmatum est, veluti piscatorum et quorundam aliorum et naviculariorum et in provinciis sunt."

³ An old inscription mutilated by age and ill usage reads: "P. Monetius sociorum libertus, Philogenes vascularius Veturia C. l. Salvia sibi et suis." (See Fabretti, Inscriptionum Antiquarum Explicatio, 632, 276.)

The collegium pistorum, union of millers, who ground grain in mortars and afterwards in mills, was also a trade organization. This trade was a very important one, as it furnished the farines for the family use of all who could afford to eat wheat flour or any of the cereals, course or fine. When we further take into account that it required at least seventy men to grind as much grain in a given time as is now ground in a steam mill by a single man, we may realize that in Rome and vicinity there must have been several thousand workmen constantly employed at this handicraft in order to produce enough to supply the demand. It must not be forgotten, however, that there were many people at Rome and everywhere, and from the earliest times, too poor to enjoy bread and who were obliged to subsist on peas, roots and other cheap food.⁴ Nevertheless the millers were numerous, and being organized, they succeeded in competing with slave labor and got considerable of the work to do as a free industry.

Originally or in the remotest antiquity, all such work was done by slaves on the paternal estate, under the eye of the paterfamilies or head of the family; but when those degraded slaves became numerous and began to think for themselves, as we have previously seen, they secured manu-

⁴ Feeding the laboring class poor food is of early record. Herodotus (Euterpe 125) expressly tells how cheap fed were laborers who built the great Egyptian monuments. They were glad to get onions, garlic and roots. The same paragraph explains the cost of their living: "Σεσήμανται δὲ διὰ γραμμάτων Αἰγυπτίων ἐν τῇ πυραμίδι, ὅσα ἔς τε συρμαίνην καὶ κρόμμυα καὶ σκόροδα ἀναισιμώθη τοῖσι ἐργαζομένοισι· καὶ ὡς ἐμὲ εὖ μεμνήσθαι τὰ ὁ ἑρμηνεύς μοι ἐπιλεγόμενος τὰ γράμματα ἔφη ἑξακόσια καὶ χίλια τάλαντα ἀργυρίου τετελέσθαι." Still earlier, Homer, (Odyssey, XIV. 414, 415, 416,) says:

"Ἀξέθ' ὕων τὸν ἄριστον, ἵνα ξείνῳ ἱερυνσω
Τηλεδαπῶ πρὸς δ' αὐτοὶ ὀνησόμεθ', οἷπερ οἷξυν
Δὴν ἔχομεν πάσχοντες ὕων ἔνεκ' ἀργισδάντων."

Shows that the poor fed on pork. See Guhl and Konor, Life of the Greeks and Romans, p. 501 for the later Roman food. Virgil, Eclogue, II. v. 9, 10, parsely smallage and onions; So Horace, Ad Pisonem; V. 249; "Nec si quid fricti ciceri probat et nucis emptor." Pliny, XXVI. 3.

missions and thus the trade unionists were mostly freedmen who had the sagacity to organize. The advantages in those days, of a good, sound, business-like union for each trade must have been very great; especially so, as their unions were communistical, and used as means of convivial enjoyment, as well as for economic ends.

Of the collegium incendarium, or firemen's association mention is made by Mommsen, who wonders why they should be suppressed; since burial and firemen's societies were among those saved.⁵

The collegium Vinariorum, (wine dealers and wine vaulters) was an institution of later date than Numa, who did not encourage wine drinking. If there are data extant regarding them at so early a time, we have failed to find them. During the time of the emperors, however, they were the subject of discussion as to whether they should be suppressed or exempted.⁶ The collegium lupanarium (brothel keepers), as is seen in the passage here cited, was an institution well known in the later ages of the Roman empire and two centuries before Christ there were secret associations of the lupanarii,⁷ of which an account has gone into⁸ history. These were curious products of the mania for organization that must have existed at Rome. But it must be remembered that the whole plebeian class of inhabitants were out in the cold, competitive world, and depending each upon his or her trade or profession which he or she considered right, so long as it was patronized by the elegant people of the other class who had social as well as political institutions upon which they could base a guaranty of safety.

During a visit in Europe we became indebted to Mr. Henry Tompkins of the Friendly Societies' Registration at London, from whose hand was first received a copy of his pamphlet on the Friendly Societies of Antiquity. We also made the personal acquaintance of Professors Vogt, Errera, Huber, Vigano and many others who referred us to volumes

⁵ "Ut enim senatus e. g. et funerum causa et incendiorum jus coeundi reliquerit, qua ratione vetiti sunt, ii qui funerario collegio intererant incendiorum causa societatem inire?" (Mommsen, De Collegiis et Sodaliciis Romanorum, p. 89).

⁶ Corpora omnium constituit vinariorum lupanarium caligarium et omnino omnium artium hisque ex sese defensores dedit et iussit quid ad quos iudices pertinerit. (Lamprid, Alex. Severus, c. 33).

⁷ See Sanger's Hist. of Prostitution, p. 68.

⁸ Livy, XXXIX. 8-19.

of Drumann, Foucart, Wescher, Lüders, Mommsen, De Broglie and others. It is through the great labors of such men that the modern students of the labor movements are made aware of what wonders in the social problem were wrought in antiquity. But their evidence is nearly all derived from the silent inscriptions upon slabs, urns and sarcophagi that survive the corroding vicissitudes of the sad centuries. In fact the industry of the archæologists may yet reveal as valuable contributions to the science of sociology as the fossil diggers have revealed to their branch of paleontology. It is now made certain from multitudes of inscriptions which have weathered the storms of more than two thousand years, that great numbers of social organizations of the laboring classes existed simultaneously in Asia Minor, Egypt, Greece and Italy.

The variety of names for them found on the relics are more attributable to epochs and languages than to differences in their character and tenets of association. Where the Greek was spoken they were called after the term eranos, meaning a meal of victuals in common, or food for which a common assessment was made upon members who enjoyed it by mutual consent. Thus it came to be a method of procuring or earning the meal—a trade union. Hence the eranoi were organizations or co-operations for the purposes of self-support; and partook more of the character of the community method, such as in our day exhibits itself at the Société de Conde sur Vesgre, than of the more prevalent co-operative associations,* like the Equitables.

This term Eranos is unmistakable in meaning. An obloquy attaches to it, pretty much the same as to our word communism, wherever it is used in the classics; because the societies existed during that period of the world's career in which the sovereignty of the individual was more fierce and intolerant toward the meeker spirit of mutual help than it is now; for the eranoi were the Greek guilds. Yet evidences are abundant that such communities existed in large numbers; that they obtained no little moral and pecuniary aid from outside; that they were persecuted by the politicians, hated by the optimates, and were obliged to assume a good deal of veneration for the gods, and play other social as well as political counter-tactics to exist.

* Consult Lüders, Die Dionysischen Künstler, Einleitende Uebersicht, S. 1-49. Verschiedenheit und Ausbreitung der Organisationen.

Another name, that of Thiasos, was given to a similar, and it would appear cotemporaneous class of organization. In fact so far as we are able to determine, the thiasoi and the eranoi were pretty much one and the same thing. But as the term thiasos with the various forms of verb and substantive, refers to demonstrations of joy, such as marching, dancing, singing and the like, in the open streets, it appears they were one kind of organization with two names—that of eranoi, the secret union which met twice and sometimes four times a month; and of the more generally known thiasoi whose members sometimes paraded in large numbers in the open air.¹⁰

Mr. Tompkins, who has devoted his very useful life to statistical matters regarding the Friendly Societies of Great Britain, is prone to picture analogies between the ancient and the modern form. Studying the former from the light he and others have rendered, we are strongly suspicious, because they were distinct from the bacchanalia and the more ancient erotiae, that they were unions of trades whose tenets involved nearly all the elements of the socialists of to-day, rather than of the present standard of liberty and development to be found in the Friendly Societies of Great Britain. According to Mr. Tompkins' list, which was always official, the Friendly Societies in 1868 numbered 23,000, with an aggregate membership of 1,700,000, and a capital of nearly 50,000,000 dollars.¹¹ The comparison therefore is at least respectable. We quote from his pamphlet on Friendly Societies of Antiquity:

“Let us now consider what these companies were which are called by the names of eranos and thiasos, and of which the following and other inscriptions have revealed the number and importance. These companies were formed of members who met together to sacrifice to certain divinities and to celebrate their festivals in common; besides this they assisted those members who fell into necessitous circumstances, and provided for their funerals. They were at once religious associations and friendly societies.”¹² Sometimes

¹⁰ See further on these distinctions in subsequent chapters, also much respecting them and the Jewish and Egyptian communes.

¹¹ Report of the Registrar of Friendly Societies of Great Britain, for the year 1868

¹² This author might have here said “trade unions;” for numbers of the

they daringly partook of a political and commercial character. These private corporations (recognized by the state), had their presiding and other officers, their priests, their funds supplied by the contributions of members and the liberality of benefactors. They assembled in their sanctuary and made decrees. They were found in great numbers in the important cities, and especially in the maritime ones. At Rhodes, for example, there were the Companions of the Sun, the Sons of Bacchus, of Minerva Lindienne, of Jupiter Atabyrius, of Jupiter the Savior. At Athens (or rather at the Piræus), there were the Heroistes, the Serapistes or company of the worshipers of the god Serapis, the Eranstes the Orgeons and lastly the thiasotes."¹²

Many of these were trade unions possessing a common fund, the amount of which depended upon the number of members who paid regular contributions, and the amount of the donations that were given from wealthier people who were in sympathy with them. There is plenty of evidence that women as well as men formed the membership of these societies. Woman took her stand with all the dignity and the honors of the man; and there are several slabs of stone and other relics on which are inscribed some of the particulars in regard to the kind and importance of the honors awarded her for faithfulness and ability in performing the duties of an executive officer. The monthly meetings or soi-eables held in enclosed gardens and groves were largely conducted by the women who gave the attractive convivial feature, which may account for their long existence and extraordinary status and power, that enabled them to do what no social society of our more enlightened age is doing—write their record as the dinotherium and the trilobite have done, in the irrefutable argument of their stone remains and inprints. There are at present very few societies of socialists of which we have any knowledge that are in the habit of chiseling out their archives with such a degree of minuteness and upon such imperishable material as was habitual with the ancient eranoi and sodalicia.

It is true, we are making so profound an impression that friendly societies of Great Britain have become, since the repeal of the conspiracy laws in 1824, genuine trade unions of the best pattern. During the existence of the cruel law of Elizabeth they maintained the title of friendly and burial societies almost exactly like the colleges and eranes.

¹² Mr. H. Thompkins' pamphlet on the Friendly Societies of Antiquity. London, 1867.

the histories and printed records of our existence and of our important transactions are slowly becoming a possible thing; and such records may possibly save us from oblivion; but the true and thorough historiographer of the labor movements of the world has a broad and attractive field—not yet all laid open—in the study, and interpretation of the multitudes of reliefs, anaglyphs, and other queer paleographs upon slabs, urns, amphoræ and such objects of those by-gone ages; a work which falls to the lot of the archæologist to develop and complete. The truth is, the history of labor has been neglected; and there is reason to believe that very nearly all of that which in this more propitious age is attracting profound consideration by the wise and benevolent, has been gone over and tried, amid the vicissitudes of wars and other antagonisms of the outside competitive world, more than two thousand years ago.

But the fact that their non-competitive plan failed of general adoption need not be adduced as an argument against them. They seem to have been very successful so far as they were intended to apply. They were trade unions for the most part among the mechanics and laboring people; and so far as their societies concerned them, they succeeded. It had not become particularly a broad question. When, however, Christ took up the principle of community of interests involved in their tenets, and organized his system of advocacy, their immediately arose upon it a world-wide culture and an opposition; because this threatened the overthrow of the competitism which has always been the basis of both social and political economy.

That the communes, called the eranoi in Greece, the Grecian Archipelago, Asia Minor and Egypt, in the Greek tongue, and the collegia, sodalicia or coetus in the Latin, were the chief cause and originators of Christendom, we can, after mature reflection, entertain little doubt.

Already faint glimpses of proof are extant that the principle or thesis of our modern community of interests, "no excellence without unity in labor," and that "endless toil in collecting good, both by experiment and observation," which is now giving preponderance to Aristotle's philosophy over that of Plato, is significantly crowding Christianity out from the impractical self-denying school of St. Jerome, back into its primeval socialism, or non-competism, in the defense of which Jesus, Nestor, and a thousand others have suffered.

Fortunately for us, the ancient trade unions were in the habit not only of writing their minutes and preserving them in their own archives, in each state where they existed but many of the great events were further inscribed either in alto, demi or basso-relievo; and many times this was done on marble or good blue or sand-stone, which has withstood all the erosions of time.

In some places, as at the Piræus the ancient seaport of Athens, in the Isle of Santorin, in Rhodes and in Asia Minor, the societies were very numerous. It is a well known fact that during the period of the existence of these nations, ranging about 58 years before Christ down to the destruction of the Alexandrian archives by Theophilus and St. Cyril, about A. D. 414, the laws against these poor people and their organizations were almost whimsically severe. M. Renan says of the Roman communes, that there was still less favor here given the disinherited classes than in other countries. During the Roman Republic, in the "affair of the Bacchanales," 186 years before Christ, the policy of Rome on the subject of these associations had first been proclaimed.¹⁴

It was the nature of the Roman people to cleave to fraternizing organizations, and especially to those of a religious character. This kind of association, however, was hateful to the patricians—the dispensers of the political power—who recognized the family and the state in actual force, as the correct social group. These patricians took the minutest precautions against allowing the plebians the scope of developing into a counter power. They had to be scrupulously authorized before they could become an association—probably by charter. They could not appoint a permanent president or magister sacrorum. The number of their members had to be limited. The meanest restrictions were enacted against their accumulating too large a fund for their commune. Similar peevishness continued against the disinherited classes during the existence of the Roman Empire. The archives of the law contained every imaginable provision for the repression of their growth.

¹⁴ So we find the great social wars or the rebellions of slaves, assisted by the unemployed original inhabitants, to have raged from about this same period.

M. Renan further asserts that the Syrians gathered into these societies inoculating them with opinions which the patricians vainly sought to destroy. The Revue Archéologique says that there was a "contest of opinions between the communes and the patricians," which is very natural; since the whole gist of the former was to do away with competitism and the system of intermediary commission men depended upon, by the patricians, as a principle for their very existence.

The Greek societies are known by inscriptions now in the Archæological Museum at Athens, to have had the following officers:

1. Three presiding officers—of both sexes: (a) the president (prostates), male; and (b) the guardian in charge (pro-eranistria), female. They had also, (c) a president of finance (archeranistes).

2. A stewardess or housewife (tamia).

3. A manager or trustee; of whom, doubtless each eranos or union had more than one (epimeletes). There are evidences that the functions of this important office were divided among the men and women of the union.

4. The recording secretary or scribe who wrote the minutes for the archives (grammateus).

5. Lawyers (sundikoi), whose exclusive business was to watch and defend the society and its members, individually as well as collectively, against the persecution of the outside competitive world which was always too prone to enforce any one of the many repressive and intolerant laws and measures above referred to, against them.

6. The manager of religious rites (hieropoios).

7. Priest, one who attended to the religious ceremonies or rites (hierokeryx).

A glance at ancient mythology will show that a great many isms, creeds or denominations existed in hierarchical affairs; and that the power of each was nearly coequal so far as political and social status or respectability was concerned. All seem to have been shielded by the law of the land. So the communes took refuge under the favors of religious discipline, and are known to have been obliged to do so to keep themselves reconciled to their persecutors. By these tactics and by the smartness of their own lawyers, who gave their time to the labor of love, they kept the hostile and restraining clauses of the law a "dead letter," in spite of the patricians and optimates. M. Renan and others declare that there were radical "differences of opinion" on the part of the unions all through those centuries. The truth is, that then, as now, their very existence was an organized socialistic state, though of a low order.

We find that some of the eranoi or Greek-speaking communities worshiped, and even dedicated themselves to one god with its peculiar litany, some to another. Here is a translation from the very slab or "stone tablet" referred to in the command of the decree, which strangely enough, has survived all the ages since the beginning of the third century before Christ. On looking it over, who shall doubt that this was a great and perhaps wealthy community, in every way respectable? It was dedicated to the mythical god, Jupiter, and chronicles the fact clearer than the recusant historian could have done upon papyrus, that it was an honorable and responsible body, and in no wise allied to the bawdy erotomania that inspired the orgies of earlier origin and that formed the subject matter of Anacreon's dithyrambs and the voluptuous bacchanalian ditties of Pindar. This translation is clipped verbatim from Mr. Henry Tompkin's pamphlet.¹⁵ "It has been proposed: seeing that Menis, son of Mnistheus, of Heraclea, is full of good will toward the thiasotes, and of zeal for the temple, that at present, being treasurer, appointed under the archontate of—— he has fulfilled that charge with zeal and honesty; that he has finished the portico and the front of the temple of Jupiter Lebraundos in a manner worthy of the god; that he has managed the common funds with honesty and justice, and that to all the thiasotes he has been irreproachable both before and after taking office as treasurer; that he has not hesitated to add his own money toward the expenses of the temple, showing thus, in an evident manner the good will that he has for the thiasotes, and that he has fulfilled the sacerdotal office in a manner worthy of the god. For all these things the thiasotes have decreed to award a vote of thanks (eulogium); to Menis, son of Mnistheus, of Heraclea; to crown him with a chaplet of foliage; to consecrate, in a part of the temple where it will be best seen, his likeness, painted on a piece of wood, according to law, in order to show to all those who wish to prove their zeal toward the temple what honors they may obtain, each one according to the good he may be able to do for the thiasotes; and to engrave this decree on a stone tablet, and to place it in the temple of the god."

¹⁵ For the original See Rep. Archéologique Paper by M. Wescher.

We have proved in our own mind that the thiasoi whose members, the thiasotes, paraded in the open streets, "dancing in honor of the gods," were identical with the secret eranoi who met much oftener to enjoy their meals, convivia, discussions and social pleasures in common and to contrive for each other situations to work. The eranoi were much less known, though their purpose was far more significant.¹⁶ They met from two to four times a month to transact business and to discuss their "difference of opinion." It was here that the above mentioned officers felt the responsibility of their functions. The treasurer was of so much importance that he was called president of finance. Doubtless the male president (prostrates) was considered to outrank the female president (proeranistia), if indeed the aristocratic idea of ranks was permitted to enter the commune. The number and importance of the offices seem to have resembled those of the Patrons of Husbandry, or Knights of Labor.

We are unable, as yet, to determine exactly what class of women it was who shared the communistic proletarian societies of Greece and the Greek-speaking inhabitants under trade union laws during the power of the Greek philosophies, but are of opinion that they were of the two most respectable classes recognized by law. It is quite certain that their movements at Athens were watched by the Areopagus or court of Mars, whose jurisdiction was over criminal cases and public order and decency. The two classes were the wives of mechanics, their daughters, and the aulitrides who made their living by playing the flute. It is almost certain that the wonderful, coexistent class of women known as the hetairai also participated in these Eranoi as members. But to prove that the aulitrides frequented them we give a translation of a Greek inscription cut in marble, edged with bas reliefs. It is of the Roman epoch and is from the Isle of Santorin in the Grecian Archipelago, not far from Nio. As Santorin was an agricultural country they might have been mostly cultivators. No matter how repressive and intolerant the laws, they could not disband. It is a slab first observed at Athens by the Archæologist M. Wescher, in which the eranoi fairly unveil their secrecy and come out in their own name. Before giving the rendering of the inscription, however, we beg to paint as we conceive it, a picture of ancient competitive life which formed the basis of Greek society. It ran to the extent of gambling; and the ethics of society may be said to have been fixed by law and public opinion at little higher than the gamblers' code. Society outside the eranoi and the thiasoi was a vast gambling hell; and the long existence of the associations, we can account for in no other way than that they in their secret recesses possessed a charmed circle. It was the infinite love that emanates from the infinite difference marked by the gulf yawning between competitive fraternal life." The poor Greek working people must have felt all this difference.

¹⁶ Athenæus, Deipnosophistai, VIII. "Ερανοί δὲ εἰσιν αἱ ἀπὸ τῶν σιμῶν καὶ ἀλλομένων εἰσαγωγαί, ἀπὸ τοῦ συνέραν καὶ συμφέρειν ἕκαστον· καλεῖται δὲ ὁ αὐτὸς καὶ ἔρανος· αἱ θῖαςος καὶ οἱ συνίοντες ἐρανισταὶ καὶ συνθῖασῶται."

Let anyone imagine himself obliged to contemplate the fashionable logic of a gambling den: A number of people sit round a table, each with his pile of gold, the sum of which is the stake involved. There is skill there. There is also genuine talent. Brilliant aptitudes in one, in the choice of cards or dice; intuition in another, to catch and forestall a niggling thought and checkmate a winning deal; shrewdness in a third at the study of features and in the reading of their inadvertent language; and in a fourth, tact to swoop in the sum of the aces against the competitors. There is no mutual adaptation of these natural gifts to a common good. These are the non-productive adornments in the "code's" diplomacy. In the usages of the gambler opinion has fixed a sort of reckless general law that acts as each gambler's guide; and to obey this law is to conform to the ethics of a code which is the competitor's idea of duty. The duty of each, whether in the exigency of the winning, or of the losing game, is to behave with decency. Such are the ethics at the gambling stakes and each must conform.

¹⁷ Aristotle lived apparently in daily contact with these communes and seems to have been influenced by them . . . ἐνίοι δὲ κοινωνιῶν δι' ἡδονιστὴν δοκοῦσι γίνεσθαι, διασωτῶν καὶ ἐρασιστῶν· αὗται γὰρ θυσίας ἐνεκα καὶ συνουσίας. Ethics, VIII. II

The excitement of the competitive game goes on. The lookers-on forget self, home and duty in their admiration of the contestants' skill. Their variety of method, their quivering versatility, their genius, bold of one, delicate of another, exhilarate as they amaze. But when the one more skilled in gaming or more favored in fortuity, sweeps the stakes and stalks off in triumph with the gold of his helpless neighbors, there must come a reaction of feeling, though the rules of the gambling table require resignation. The defeated need not try to hide discomfiture. A hungry wife and children, blighted hopes, baffled plans and chagrin, beget despair. They are the conjurers of distrust, jealousy, vengeance, hate, suicide. Even the winner dies in misery; for a little selfish ecstasy adds nothing to the sum of a life's possibilities and joys. He is often the next victim in the shifting vicissitudes of the trade.

Now this is a fair picture of that hell which constituted ancient society. The household, the shambles of voluptuous commerce and of deal, the judiciary and the war-spirit were so many sheols of licensed competism reeking with a virus of the gambler's code and intolerant of this socialism of the poor. Unfortunately it is too exact a picture of the maudlin present; but the present we are not dealing with.

Society was a vast concern in which fashions, means and fine things were huckstered and raffled from hand to hand; and then as now, the working classes or proletariat were the sensitive target which every club of misguided genius bruised and imbruted.

The discovery, then, of unquestionable proof that there existed contemporaneously with this outside state of things an order of human association whose code of ethics, or whose accepted opinion of duty, one to another, was the antithesis of this; whose rule of home and labor was based deep in that love and mutual protection which afterwards became the doctrine of salvation as proclaimed by a greater teacher,¹⁸ is a triumph glorius and incalculable to the struggling, disjointed love of the labor movement to-day. The fragment at Athens referred to is a piece of blue Hymettian marble with little border work. The inscription is in plain Attic Greek of the Aristotelian epoch, and its translation from the Revue Archéologique, is as follows:

¹⁸ Plato, Aristotle and Socrates were all deeply touched by the brotherly love of the innumerable erastis whose works though humble were followed by them

"By a rutable and just administration of the common fund of money belonging to the community of eranistai, and having ever conducted himself with kindness and with honesty; and as he has righteously husbanded the funds successively paid by the eranistai themselves, as well as the annual subscription, according to the law of the eranos; and in view of the fact that in everything else he still continues to show integrity to the oath which he swore to the eranistai, therefore Hail Alcmeon!

"The community of the eranistai rejoice to praise Alcmeon, son of Theon, a stranger who has been naturalized—their president of finance (archeranistes); and do crown him with a chaplet of foliage because of his faithfulness and good will to them. They are moreover rejoiced and praise the trustees (epimaletai) and also the hieropoiai of Jupiter the Savior, and of Hercules, and of the Savior of the gods. And they crown each of them with the wreath of honor because of their virtue and their lively interest in the community of the eranistai."

The stone is here broken, leaving us in the dark as to the exact date of this interesting relic. The principle however, upon which this eranos was conducted, accepting the signification given this word by lexicographers and writers of the adverse school, was communism—means taxed from a common membership for mutual support. This settled, we next ask: did such an experiment thrive? The above inscription is full of praises and rejoicing over its success. Then if it did succeed, and if in conjunction with it, it is made clear that the less secret jubilees of the thiasoi furnished means out of the same well-husbanded fund, for the sweet convivia, and the dance, to the famous music of the female flute-players, did not this "community of the eranistai" greatly augment for the "disinherited classes," the means of happiness and virtue?

all. Lüders commenting, quotes Socrates from Xenophon, Conversations VIII. "Wir sind ja alle Thiasoten dees gotica." This passage gives strong evidence that Socrates was a member of a commune.

These are important conjectures coming from the unwritten mists of the finest of the world's ages of antiquity. Let the ethnologist and the paleontologist divest themselves of bias, and with these new skeletons of ancient history remodel and reproduce an ethologic anatomy of these two great rivals for power—individualism and communal love. For if the desired means of happiness was procured through this one experiment of whose relics we have given a rendering, then it is evident by the many other similar inscriptions that a thousand such microcosms embellished the morals and gladdened the hearts of slaves and outcasts.

These microcosms of a far future society must not, however, be supposed to have been as sweeping or as pure in their radicalism as some that are developing at the present time; for it must be remembered that though the ignorance of the present age is averse to the implanting of a system which means introversion and revolution of competitive disassociation, yet we possess at least the boon of tolerance which was almost utterly denied the struggling poor of those times.

According to the best information to be had regarding inscriptions that are resuscitating the history of the ancient proletaries, the societies called the eranoi and the thiasoi were by no means confined to the Hellenic Peninsula and the Ionian and Grecian Archipelagoes. Similar societies are known to have existed both on the continent of Asia and of Africa. Mommsen, Orelli, Böckh and other archaeologists, in their Latin works of Descriptiones Reliquarum, have filled thousands of folio pages with sketches of all sorts of paleographs which are fac-similes of inscriptions, monograms, escutcheons and many kinds of hieroglyphic and anaglyphic graverly and embossing in stone and metal. These curious things are being dug up in different parts of Europe, Asia and Africa, wherever ancient history speaks of the doings of men.

Great numbers are described that have come from Dalmatia, the rivers and plains of Austria, Hungary and the Kranish provinces. They exist in countries once occupied by the Armenians, Phœnicians and Chaldeans; and as it is now becoming apparent that the most correct philosophies of the Alexandrians and Athenians were first inspired by Indians of the east, it is possible that great revelations are yet forthcoming from the Hindoo school, of which the Sankhya Kapila was the inspiring oracle. But however this may be—whether Buddhism was, or was not the idiosyncrasy that germinated the every-growing schism among dialecticians of all succeeding ages, it matters little.

One thing is certain in our mind : that the societies of self-help among the proletaries have uniformly followed the grouping, self-teaching, peripatetic method of Aristotle and Kapila, while their competitive enemies and persecutors have followed the dreamy, non-practical Olympus-beclouded generalities of Plato. The communities always worked well under Numa, Solon, Jesus and Nestor, but always suffered under Lycurgus, Appius Claudius, Cæsar and Cyril. If the strange and newly unearthed library of Assurbanipal, who was emperor of the Assyrians a thousand years before Christ, is ever scanned in a non-prejudicial spirit, its ideographs and its history of their systems of nomenclature, computation and collection may be found suggestive of similar doings.

We have already said something concerning the rules and by-laws of the societies, which by the marble tablet whereon their records are graven, are known to have existed. As a general thing these decrees and regulations are made on the stones that still honor some of the officers. Although the evident object of each of these organizations was to enlarge the means of happiness of the members by providing liberties for them through the associative sphere of the collectivity, and may be said on this account to have been temporal in their objects, yet they all partook strongly of some religious faith inculcated at the services of the gods in the temples.

Some writers upon the subject are convinced that they resembled the old semi-religious guilds of trade in England. They also intimate that like the continental guilds for a similar object, connected with the Roman Catholic Church, they seem to have been under the patronage of a tutelary saint, and that under this tutelage they sometimes founded industrial, commercial and maritime corporations. Sometimes they made it a specialty to aid each other in acquiring a profession. Our own opinion is, that they were a genuine type of the trade union.¹⁹ The evidences of this are many; and it is no argument against the position if they are found to have been religious.

The objections will be, that they opened their sessions with prayer, and that they admitted women in large numbers. But some of our own trade unions undergo forms similar to prayer and Bible reading. As to their having had women as members it only proves that they were trade unions of a higher, more long-lived and a more successful development than these of the present day; and this brings us to the sad reflection that with all the boast of modern trade unionists and all the good they are doing, and with all their philosophy and practical forcing of the true political economy upon governments, they still fail to equal the judgment of the trade unionists of Greece, who based their associations upon co-operation for peaceful, rather than co-operation for aggressive self help. Another resemblance to the trade unions is seen in their extreme secrecy.

"The meetings of these pre-Christian societies opened with prayer; after which came the general business. The place at which they were held was called the synod, or sometimes the Synagogue, and the assembly was absolutely secret—no stranger could be admitted, and a severe code maintained order thereat. They were held, it appears, in enclosed gardens surrounded with porticos, or piazzas or little arbors, in the middle of which the altar of sacrifice was erected. The officers made the candidates for membership submit to a sort of examination, and they had to certify that they were 'holy, pious and good.' There was in these little confraternities, during the two or three centuries that preceded the Christian era, a movement which was almost as varied as that which produced in the middle ages so many religious orders and so many sub-divisions of these orders. Very many have been counted in the single island of Rhodes, of which several bear the names of their founders or of their reformers. Several of these confraternities, especially that of Bacchus, had sublime and elevated doctrines; and endeavored with a good will to give to mankind some consolation. If there still remained in the Greek world any love, any piety, any religious morality, it was owing to the liberty granted to such private religious doctrines. The doctrines competed in some measure with the official religion, the decline of which became more evident day by day."²⁰

¹⁹ The reasons for their being often religious and borrowing gods or tutelary duties are explained in our chapter on the Roman trade unions, q. v.

But it must not be inferred because the eranoi, or Greek-speaking unions took the name of the particular god they venerated, that they were exclusively religious.

The archæologist, Hamilton, has produced fac-similes of inscriptions on slabs that were found on the shores of the Gulf of Symi. The translation of one runs thus:

"Alexander, of Cephalonia, has been honored with the gift of a crown of gold, and also Nisa, his virtuous wife, of Cos. This honor is given by the Adoniastes, Aphrodiastes and the Asclepiastes. Epaphrodite and his wife, by wish of the Heroistes and of the Aeaciastes, have also been honored with a golden crown."

These Adoniastes, Aphrodiastes, Asclepiastes, etc., were eranoi, whose union was, on account of the peculiar religious notions of the members and of the country, dedicated respectively to the gods Adonis, Aphrodite, Esculapia, etc. Another inscription taken from Ross's Inscriptiones Greques,²¹ is also very interesting as proof that these societies were usually dedicated to the popular gods of the mythic hierarchy of Mount Olympus.

It is valuable as a proof of the general position assumed, on account of its bold mention of union and confraternity thus showing that it belonged to the eranian and thiasian school of co-operation or trade unionism. It is from Rhodes, and is somewhat defaced. Here is the rendering as given in Mr. Tompkins' review: "* * * crowned with a crown of gold by the community of Jupiter Xenos, the Dionysiastes Chæremoniens, as well as by the Panatheniastes and the * * * * * crowned with a crown of gold by the Soteriastes (worshippers of the Soter, or Messiah), the confraternity of Jupiter Xenos, and that of Minerva Lindienne, followers of Caius, crowned with a crown of foliage by the community of Jupiter Atabyrien and the Agathodaemoniastes Philioniens, as well as by the community of Dionysiastes Chæremoniens and by that of Appollo."

²⁰ Tompkins, Friendly Societies of Antiquity.

²¹ Researches in Asia Minor.

This date "in the year 178" is supposed to mean the 178th year of the existence of this union. Here we have, in the midst of the lady members of this old and probably rich and respectable eranos, or union and at the public feast or monthly sociable in the enclosed garden that always distinguished the open thiasoi from the secret business meeting of the eranoi, a flute-player; in all probability one of the famous auletrides whose charms are celebrated by Alciphron, Athenæus and Theopompus; and of whom a writer in his work on prostitution, unconsciously intimates that they were abandons²² and would doubtless construe it so as to make this feast no nobler than the callipygian games, which though unfrequented by men must have been, of course, "scandalous." May not anything be scandalous when regarded in a censorious and uncharitable light. But this feast of the Communists described was nothing of the sort.

This invaluable memento is in good care and preservation in the museum at Athens. On the bas-relief are these suggestive figures: A god and a goddess in an enclosed garden. It is Cybele the Phrygian goddess who sits with her head crowned. In front of her crouches a lion? The god is Apollo in a flowing robe and in a standing attitude. He has a salver (patera) in one hand and a lyre in the other. There is a priestess or proeraniatria standing, and a musician or auletrid is playing the flute.²³ A lamb for the feast is in the arms of a young man. Under this is the inscription of which the following is the translation.

"Stratonice, daughter of Menecrates, is crowned by the members, men and women, of this thiasos. In the year 178 she (Stratonice) was female president of the club (proeraniatria), a crown of foliage is decreed her and a marble tablet ornamented with banderoles to honor her public proclamation in the assembly of Jupiter in honor of her virtue."

It is not only interesting but extremely useful as an example for the guidance of future society, that we be made acquainted with some of the inner and unrecorded life of antiquity. The same turbulent warlike millions swarmed the cities and thoroughfares then, as now. The same unorganized and inequitable methods of production and apportionment. The same egoism and sacrifice of neighbor for aggrandizement of self, and the same intolerance and bigotry in prevailing faiths that inspire the competing Muscovite Russians against the Rural Solidarities, the Mennonites and the Dutchobors to-day—the same selfishness that makes man hate man, and church hate church wherever we go. In this prodigious whirlpool of self-serving negativeness and ignorance—the painful, tiresome desert through which all proletarian humanity plods, it is gratifying to discover that a great counter element once existed with organizations based upon that community of equal interests which is fundamentally revolutionizing the policies of our own brilliant, but depraved and selfish century.

²² Sängers, History of Prostitution, p. 46.

²³ See also Tafel II. Lüders, Die Dionysischen Künstler. Explanation of the plates, S. 10-11.

The specimen adduced was a festival of aneranos—it was the thiasos itself, and a glance at Liddell will satisfy the skeptic that it was a society of poor, persecuted people, who agreed to assess each other in common for their daily food and their monthly convivials; and the proof that these poor girls were sometimes members greatly intensifies the interest in them. Besides, it is a known fact that among these musical trades unionists were some of the most beautiful and intelligent people the world ever produced. It was not considered prostitution in those days to do what they did. The stern philosopher Zeno, hero of Stoicism, fell desperately in love with one; and if we are to believe Athenæus was ready to defend his love with the antics of a madman. This was after he had vainly insulted her because she came to him for protection.

But the most magnificent proof of the communist movement in those days is yet to be given.

CHAPTER XXII.

THE ANCIENT BANNER.

INCALCULABLY GED FLAG OF LABOR.

THE OLD, Old Crimson Ensign—An Emblem of Peace and Good Will to Man—Strange Power of Human Habit—Descent of the Red Banner through Primitive Culture—White and Azure the Colors of Mythical Angels, Grandees and Aristocrats—Colors for the Lowly without Family, Souls or other Seraphic Attributes—How the Red Vexillum was Stolen from Labor—Tricks which Compromised Peace Tenets of the Flag—The Flag at the Dawn of Labor's Power—Testimony of Polybius—Of Livy—Of Plutarch—Causes of Working People's Affection for Red—The Emblem of Health and the Fruits of Toil—Ceres and Minerva their Protectresses and Mother-Goddesses Wore the Flaming Red—Emblem of Strength and Vitality—Archæology in Proof—Their Color First Borrowed from Crimson Sun-Beams—More Light and less Darkness—White and Pale Hues for the Priests—Origin of the Word "FLAG"—It is the Word-Root of "Flame" a Red Color—Proofs Quoted—Mediæval Banner in France and England—The Red of All Modern Flags Borrowed from that of the Ancient Unions—Disgraceful Ignorance of Modern Prejudice and Censure.

THE typical color of the great non-laboring classes in ancient times was white and azure blue; while that of the strictly laboring element was red. This phenomenon has come down to us by the power of habit, from high antiquity.¹

¹ Consult Tylor, Primitive Culture, (Vol. I pp. 70, sq. N. Y. 1888, Survival, for illustrations on the power of habit: "The saying that marriages in May are unlucky—believed so 18 centuries ago and more, see Ovid, Fastus, V.—survives to this day in England, a striking example how an idea, the meaning of which has perished for ages, may continue to exist simply because it has existed. There are thousands of cases of this kind which have become, so to speak, land-

White, in heathen mythology, was thought to be emblematical of degree. It was the color used by the gens families and by the priesthood. Very often a beautiful azure of various shades accompanied the pure white. Following this habit of the optimates and their hierarchy, we still imagine white to be the color of the robes of angels, and still make it a holy color.² All people, ancient or modern, having a history and a priesthood with concomitant crafts, have regarded white as the adumbration of holiness, of purity, of aristocracy. It is the color which befits itself to superstition and to property; therefore the gens or the gentle, who do not work, who are unsoiled, who eat up the products of labor, who robe themselves in white and ascend throne, see, chancel, pulpit or patriarchal seat, and who talk of their "subjects" whom they spurn and absorb, are of all others most certain to flaunt the robes of white and azure and shining purple. These colors date from a dim era of antiquity, and like the etymon they were self-suggestive as the antithesis of sweat and toil and grime. They embellished and decked the bodies of the "washed," and could not go hand in hand with creatures smoked and smeared at the furnace and the anvil. Hence a contempt of labor.³ The idea of Plato which he copied from the Pagan religion and which Christianity unfortunately afterwards copied from him, under the name of Neo-Platonism, was that of white robes, white wings, white banners—a mysterious power in the clouds, a home at Mount Olympus, and the vaulted dome of heaven—and myriads of slaves and menials in red, brown, dun and murk who were to plod without souls, liberties marks in the course of culture." This author hereupon cites many instances showing the extreme age of our paltriest habits, some of which are really astonishing. One of the most striking instances which might have been enumerated by Mr. Tylor, along with the many that he here adduces, is the red banner, which for antiquity and pith of antecedent meaning has perhaps no rival in the tale of primitive culture. We have another remark illustrative of the power of habit and one which may be regarded as curious and far-fetched, made by Rogers, Social Life in Scotland, Vol. I. p. 6, in speaking of the giants and cave-dwellers of the stone period: "In popular superstition there still linger memories of the Neolithic age." This is really wonderful.

² Revelations, vii. 9, 14. So idem, xix. 8: "And to her was granted that she should be arrayed in fine linen, clean and white, for the fine linen is the righteousness of saints." So again xix. 14, "And the armies which were in heaven followed him upon white horses, clothed in fine linen, white and clean."

³ Guhl and Koner, Life of the Greeks and Romans, tr. Hüffer, p. 485, speaking of the ancients says: "The usual color of the dress was originally white (for the toga this was prescribed by law), only poor people, slaves and freedmen wore dress of the natural brown or black colors." Red, a "color," was always considered finer than brown or black, though all were labor colors.

honors or rewards, in the degrading service of keeping them white, clean-washed and fat. The idea of Aristotle, the practical, was, that labor itself was pure, worthy, and the only thing which could possibly lead men to knowledge and good; yet even his great mind could not at that early day discern a method of ridding the world of slaves, although Socrates, a member of a commune that waved the red banner, had told them that manual labor was a virtue.⁴

Again, white was the color of the ancient aristocratic flag or military banner, both of the Romans and Greeks. This is distinctly told to us in an elaborate description of all the phases of the subject, by Polybius,⁵ who wrote just at the time when the greater slave rebellions were beginning fiercely to rage.

As long as the ancient military ranks remained undefiled by the presence of slaves and freedmen, or persons of lowly condition, the semeion or vexillum, that is, the flags and banners were white, azure and gray. But we find that curiously enough, the red vexillum comes temptingly into the Roman tent at the very time when the workingmen began to assume military and political importance. It was evidently introduced as a means for inspiring this class of soldiers to desperate acts of valor;⁶ because the red banner of the communes was so sacred to them that they would recklessly cast their lives into the jaws of death in the act of recapturing it from an enemy. Multitudes of instances are on record proving that the Roman generals cunningly managed to toss the vexillum or red banner, in some surreptitious manner, over into the enemy's camp at a moment of onset, thereby enthusing the soldiers with a reckless oblivion of danger, as they crushed into it in desperate haste and determination to seize from the polluted fingers of the barbarian their endeared and cherished flag.⁷

⁴ For more on this great man's philosophy, see chapters iv. on the Eleusinian Mysteries, and xxiv. on the Plans of the Ancient Benefactors.

⁵ Polybius Megal, Historia, VII. c. 39, pp. 676-677, ed. Gronovii. Amstelodami, 1670: 'Ὅς ἀπάντων ὀρισμένων καὶ συνήθων ὄντων διασημάτων μετὰ δὲ ταῦτα σημαίαν ἐπηξάν μείαν μὲν τὴν πρώτην ἐν ᾧ δεῖ τόπῳ τὴν τοῦ στρατηγοῦ σκηνὴν δουτεραν δὲ τὴν ἐπὶ τῆς πρεσβείας πλουρᾶς, τρίτου ἐπὶ μεσῆς τῆς γραμμῆς ἐφ' ἧς οἱ χιλιάρχοι τρέφουσιν τετράτην παρ' ποθεν τὰ στρατόπεδα. Καὶ ταύτας μὲν ποιοῦσσι φοινικὰς τε δὲ καὶ στρατηγοῦ λουκίου. Τα δὲ ἐπὶ θάτερα ποτὲ μὲν ψηλὰ δόρατα πηγνύουσι, ποτὲ δὲ σημαίας ἐκ τῶν ἄλλων χρωμάτων.'

⁶ In earlier times the plebeian class were refused admission to armies as soldiers solely on the ground that military work is aristocratic. They finally overcame this prejudice to some extent.

⁷ Plutarch, Paulus Æmilius. "The Romans who engaged the phalanx, be-

The curiosity of the reader may by this time be aroused to understand what may have been the cause of this strange affection. We shall attempt to bring out, so far as authentic evidence can be had, the facts lying at the bottom of the ineffaceable love in the strictly proletarian class, for the beautiful and incomputably aged red banner; and in doing so, we may help the inquirer in the effort to discern the causes of this emblem having so successfully breasted the storms of adversity and time and come down to us embalmed in the same love and veneration that shrouded and shielded it in deep antiquity, when it knew and comforted men only as poor and lowly slaves.

In the heathen mythology two great and celebrated deities presided over labor—Minerva and Ceres. The Greek names of these celebrated and much adored mythic deities were Demeter for Ceres, goddess of agriculture and fruitfulness of the earth, and Athena for Minerva, goddess of manual labor and protectress of working women and workmen. These two great deities wore flaming red.⁸

Bacchus of the Romans and Dionysus were the same myths with Ceres and Athena; that is, they seem to have personified in the male what these goddesses did in the female; and their vesture, like that of the goddesses, was flaming red. So Apollo, who was none other than the sun, was allied to them in functions. The reason of this is, that both genders of these imaginary beings represented the ancient sun-worship. The brilliant, flaming light of the sun is ing unable to break it. Salus, a Pelignian officer snatched the ensign of the company, and threw it among the enemy. Hereupon the Pelignians, rushed forward to recover it, for the Italians look upon it as a great crime and disgrace to abandon their standard. A dreadful conflict and slaughter on both sides ensued." Cæsar, De Bello Gallico, often speaks of incidents of this kind.

⁸ The state robe of Athena was generally of a flaming red. Abundance of evidence also shows the colors of these two patrons of labor to have been red. Red was also the color of Proserpine, the daughter of Demeter or Ceres: This was not confined to Greece and Rome. The same myths wore red in Asia, Africa and even in Britain. See Hughes, Horæ Britannicæ, Vol. I. p. 294, Lond. 1818: "The British Ked or Ceridwen, is in many respects the same character as the Ceres of the Greek mythology and the Isis of the Egyptians. * * * * "She was arrayed in a vesture of flaming silk; a strong wreath of ruddy gold was about the neck, wherein was set a precious pearl, and rows of coral; yellower was her hair than the blossoms of the broom; her skin was whiter than the foam of the wave; her hands and fingers were fairer than the opening buds of the water-lily, amid the small ripplings of the fountain of waters; or the sight of the hawk after mewing, or the sight of the falcon of three mews; no brighter eyes than hers were seen; whiter was her bosom than the breast of the fair swan; redder her cheeks than the rose of the mountain; whoever saw her was filled with love; four white trefoils were seen to rise in her way wherever she came, and therefore was she named Olwen or the fair lady."

thought to have been the first object of awe and wonder before which primitive man bowed himself down in adoration. It was the great and magnificent orb of day that in spring warmed the first sprigs of vegetable life. To the grand monarch of the day, the ancient laboring man first gave homage for light and heat which caused the fruits of his planting to grow and ripen. As this wondrous being, always believed to be alive and rational, immense in bulk, exquisite in beauty, radiant with heat and life, rose out of the sea and skimmed over their heads, he shed forth his crimson flames upon their labor and his color was likened to the fluid that coursed in their veins. The Dionysus thus became the protective principle for the Greek-speaking and the Bacchus for the Latin-speaking world, on which the vast system of labor organizations we have described was founded, cultivated and perpetuated for thousands of years; and their natural color was red, or color refined.

This accounts for the high-born or optimate class represented in the priesthood, the military, the non-laboring element—in other words, the pretended pure, clean-washed and unsoiled—having a contempt for color and for labor that soiled; and it also accounts for all the low-born, represented in occupations of agriculture and mechanics like the laboring element, or the tainted, tarnished, sweat-begrimed, having a natural love of color, whose highest type is red.

It was a thing most natural that the emblems of Ceres should be of a red color. She was of herself a majesty of no inferior sort. The products of her care were wheat and other grain, the supply of which from the earth, furnished the red blood always known to be the animating and strength-giving fluid of life; although the exact action of blood from heart to lungs and thence through arteries, and its return through veins was a more recent discovery. It is thus very natural that we should find among the organizations which chose Ceres as their patron divinity, the strictest adherence to her coat of arms and her emblems and escutcheons, the same colors that she was known to prefer.

Accordingly the inscriptions contain representations of the ancient banner, so well known to have been carried at the innocent and legalized parades of the thiasotes and orgiastes in Greece, Palestine, Asia Minor and the islands, and by the sodales and collegia in almost every town, little or large, in Italy.* Even at Carthage and all along the coast of North Africa remains of these organizations are being found.

A powerful natural reason for their preferring this color was probably its beauty. The color red is known in optics to be the first one on the list. Then come orange, yellow, green, blue, indigo and violet.¹⁰ White is not a color. Azure is a hue. Red of a brilliant hue may be seen at a greater distance than any other color and it is of all gifts of nature one of the most beautiful and inspiring. Many have dubbed Ceres the tutelary patroness of the United States.¹¹ The flag adopted by the American Union is, scientifically considered, a very perfect one; the metaphorical meaning of the red which is placed in the stripes, being the same as that involved in the ancient, which has a wonderful history in the past of labor. If the modern republic has any divinity at all, it is Ceres, Rhea, Cybele, Isis, the protectress of the farmers, and Minerva the guardian of mechanics and inventions. The red means the stripes; not the revengeful, bloody red with the present meaning trumped up against it in some wilfully ignorant minds, covering with obloquy which present society, unable to disabuse itself of the ancient grudge and contempt of labor, still uses against the red flag, but the exact reverse—the stripes represent the blows which labor in her great conflict to free herself from enslavement, poverty and oppression, has received upon her back from the lash of aristocracy and brutal force. Unwittingly, perhaps, the United States adopted these stripes as a component part of its beautiful and suggestive national banner; and this act was a strictly scientific one; for it exactly conforms with the ancient symbol red, enormously used by Roman and Greek organizations expressive and significant of the scourge, the stripes and the lines of blood which streaked the naked backs of the poor and lowly of ancient labor.¹²

* Consult chapter xxi. supra, also Lüders, Die Dionysischen Künstler; Encyclopédie Tech.

¹⁰ The Encyclopædia Britannica, in an exhaustive article on Light, (Vol. XIV. p. 582), reduces the primitive colors to three—red, green and violet. This makes red to be the monarch of colors, as the oak is the monarch of trees, the lion the monarch of quadrupeds, or man the monarch of mortals. A respectable authority for modern colors, the Encyclopédie Technologique, Tome. I. Art. Couleur, init. says: "Ces couleurs fondamentales sont: Le rouge, l'orangé, le jaune, le bleu, l'indigo et le violet." Here also the red is the first mentioned of all colors. The Encyclopædia Britannica, Vol. VII. p. 495, says; "the red holds the highest position among all dyed colors."

¹¹ Carnegie, Triumphant Democracy, p. 180. "Ceres the prime divinity of the United States."

We now proceed to give a history of the red emblem as used against labor by the rich and strong, for the seeming purpose of making capital out of the reverence and affection always clinging in the organizations, which from more ancient times they had inherited as the chosen color of their divinities, Ceres, Minerva, Saturn and perhaps Apollo.

In the first place it is necessary to enter into an analysis of the word "flag." A glance at a Latin dictionary will explain that flag is the root of the word "flamma"—a circumstance altogether extraordinary. Andrews for instance, defines flamma as follows: "Flamma, æ. (archaic gentive singular flammai, used by Lucretius, I. 726; 899; V. 1088) feminine (flagma from FLAG; whence flagro and flagito, Greek phlegma, from phlégo). A blazing fire, blaze, flame."

This is an aged word and has its real origin in the red beams of the sun which almost all men in primitive ages adored under the religion of the sun-worshippers. Without the slightest doubt this original flag was one of the names of the ancient banner which was red. Because it was red and carried by the secret organizations on which the ruling minority cast a taint, it never attained to enough popularity to be used by ancient writers, and consequently failed to come down to us in form of an emblem, or with the significance of a banner or flag, although it never lost its original meaning; and its many variations of form appear in history times without number. The innocent original changed in time to a multitude of instruments of torture. It got to be flagitium, a shameful act, then flagrum a whip, and as such was stuck in bundles (fascēs), along with an axe and carried in threatening pomp by the august prætors to scourge slaves with. How could the old red flag differentiate into a whip?

It was simply the work of hate and prejudice. The organizations would never give up their red banners; they are carrying them still by the power of habit, although the belief in the power of the once omnipotent Ceres and Minerva has long since faded from the earth.¹³ The prejudice against their banner and the innumerable communes was based upon their supposed meanness, which is also fast being outgrown. This prejudice was also heightened¹⁴ by the fact that the organizations grew powerful, sometimes rich and influential, always preaching a cult opposed to the despotism of capital and often and especially in Italy, as we have seen, becoming a potent factor in politics, which was a crime against the aristocracy of ownership and military and political power held by the great gens families and their slave-based religion.

¹² Slaves and freedmen sometimes composed, portion of the forces of armies in the time of Polybius. This author who wrote as early as B. C. 145, describes the arrangement in the camps, of both slaves and freedmen, as well as their duties: "Μετά δὲ τὴν στατοπδειαν συναθροισθέντες οἱ χιλιάρχοι, τοὺς ἐκ τοῦ στρατοπέδου πάντες ἐλευθέρους ὁμοῦ ἢ δούλους ὀρκίζουσι, καθ' ἓνα ποιούμενοι τε ὀρκισμόν. Ὁ δὲ ὄρκος ἐστίν· μηδὲν ἐκ τῆς παρέμβολης κλεψεῖν· ἀλλὰ καὶ εὐρὴ τῆς τουτ' ἀνοίσειν ἐπὶ τοῖς χιλιάρχοις." Polybius, Historia, VI. 31, init.

It is thus plainly seen that in ancient days, the red banner was an emblem among the labor societies, of blood-making, not of blood-letting; while among the grandees it was emblematical of blood-spilling and torture; never indicative of building up, either the human body or the body politic. The system upon which the ancient aristocracy rested was cruelly and ferociously competitive and its product was slavery while its instruments of creating as well as perpetuating this thankless institution were legalized lasciviousness of its lords, and whips and scourges dyed red in the blood of laborers whose backs streaked with crimson which flowed from the furrows made by thongs, that their own greatness and their victims' littleness might be more widely contrasted.¹⁵

Let us now turn to the working people and their flag. In the first place the primitive mind of man conceives a fondness for flaming colors, and red, which is the champion of tints, attracted their delight by its beauty. One may stretch the imagination to conceive that this fact originated its adoption by his protecting divinities; for he would naturally incline to fix their favorite colors in harmony with his own tastes or fancies. We have as a result, of the natural and innocent fancy of primitive mind for this beautiful ground-color, all the lowly estate of antiquity, fixing their institutions in blazoned red, and nailing virtue, peace, socialism, poverty and resignation, to their unobtrusive banner—a brilliant red. We find them, too, irrevocable in the belief that God, dressed in the crimson glories of the sun and in awful justice, threw light and warmth and glory upon the crops of their sowing and the mechanical products of their handicraft; while the power of habit—that second law of perpetuation of being—has transmitted, even to this day, an ineffaceable love in the poor, for those endeared and cherished emblems.¹⁶

¹³ See Bouillet. Histoire des Communités des Arts et des Métiers de l'Auvergne, passim. Text and plates, representing the "bannières" as were used in middle ages.

¹⁴ Juvenal., Satires.

¹⁵ Lycurgus, whose slaves system in Lacedemon we have described, laid down a rule by which slaves were whipped at night without having committed an offense after having worked all day. This punishment was to humiliate them for submissiveness next day. They must also crouch lest should they stand erect they be compared with men. See Plutarch Lycurgus.

The celebrated red *himation*¹⁷ and chiton were for a long time the principal article of clothing. The dancing girls and flute-players wore them during the voluptuous age of Athens. They were worn at the feasts of Dionysus by the communists of the thiasoi. Of this we have the positive evidence of numerous inscriptions, some of which, although engraved on stone, are very good pictures of the feasters returning from their march through the streets.

At Rome this love of the red banner among the plebeians was often turned to profit by the rich. After the overthrow of the Roman kings (B. C. 510), two officers little less in power than the kings themselves, were installed as supreme rulers in their place. These were the consuls. A great growth of the power of the laboring element, as we have shown in preceding chapters on Trade Unions, very gradually came into the world; and this new force immediately began to make incursions upon and against the consular authority. The red flag is involved in this quarrel. It had been the kings who upheld the unions; the consuls, who

¹⁶ Examples proving red to have been the primeval color among the servant class are being constantly discovered in the inscriptions. Dr. Schliemann, in Tiryns, pp. 303-307, gives Prof. Fabricius' descriptions of the "mighty bull," recently discovered in a wall-painting of that pre-Homeric city. The animal, mostly red, is leaping and bounding at the games, while an acrobat upon his back is girding him in the dangerous scene. These actors, always of the slave race (see chap. xvii. Amusements of Antiquity, pp. 401-414), were tugging and sweating without pay, for masters, a thousand years before Christ. This scene is represented in Plate XIII. while fig. 142 gives another proof of the remarkable proclivity in days before Homer, for red. "Whilst the lower broad stripe is red, the ground of the ornament shows a bright red colour; the two strokes of the scale-like ornament are black, the little circles and lines within the scales, white. Very noteworthy is the simultaneous occurrence of two different shades of the red color."

¹⁷ Guhl and Koner, Life of the Greeks and Romans, p. 160, sqq. These garments are here minutely described. "Men also appear in these pictures with the cherry coloured chlamys and the red himation." But we remark that the same authors assure us in both their descriptions of the Greeks, and of the Romans, that colors were only for the common people. In course of time the himation, originally white and worn by the rich, became popular and took on the plebeian hue.

from the very first, endeavored to suppress them. These magnates were the natural enemies of the working class; the kings their natural friends. This seeming phenomenon is a suggestive fact of history. The kings wanted and recognized their systematic, organized labor; the consuls, who were sure to be rich grandes of blood and family, were jealous as well as afraid of this new and growing power which the mild and favorable laws of the kings had made it possible for labor to develop under.

This was the origin of the greatest intestine contest Rome ever had. It was a death-grapple of lordship with labor, in which consular power aped the banner and color of communes,¹⁸ and even bent all energy to involve Rome in Great wars of conquest for the express object of wriggling out of the terrible plebeian grip.¹⁹

The patrician consuls fought the hated workingmen, according to Livy, with such an unabating determination for about five years (B. C. 375-370), as to cause a *solitudo magistratum*²⁰ or vacancy, in which there occurred what is now called an interregnum—neither the lords nor the people, holding the helm of power. This was under the plebeian, Licinus Stolo, author of the agrarian law, the most renowned statute of antiquity—a germ of the same contention which cost the Gracchi, Blossius and Clodius their lives, as champions for the poor in the memorable agrarian and labor turmoils, and finally brought Rome, with her Cicero and Cæsar to an ignominious end, because she purloined the ægis of laborers on whom she glutted herself while maintaining slavery as a fundament of her religion and government.

¹⁸ See Encyclopædia Britannica, 9th edition, Stoddart, Phil. Vol. VI. p. 279, describing the consuls: "A cloak with a scarlet border and an ivory staff were badges of their office." For more than 600 years thereafter the scarlet which darkened into purple became a state color. The consuls stole the red vestibulum by a similar species of trick, from the communes—a blasphemy against the ancient peace-color of Ceres and Minerva the protecting divinities of laborers and the fruits of labor. The following modern criticism admits this: If the consuls "wished to subdue any outbreak of the plebeians, they feigned that some powerful enemy was marching against the city, and thus succeeded in obtaining extraordinary powers." Encyclopædia Britannica, Vol. VI. p. 280.

¹⁹ Speaking of those patrician consuls, the same author in idem, column 2, says: "Having once begun the struggle (against the plebeians), however, they maintained it for the space of 80 years, with a spirit and resolution which made even a foreign war desirable as a relief from internal contests."

²⁰ Livy, VI. 35, fin. "Haud irritæ cecedere minæ: comitia, præter ædiliū tribunorumque plebis, nulla sunt habita. Licinius Sextiusque, tribuni plebis re-fecti, nullos curules magistratus creari passi sunt: eaque solitudo magistratum, et plebe reficiente duos tribunos, et his comitia tribunorum militum tollentibus, per quinquennium urbem tenuit." Such was the tremendous power of the out-cast element that Rome lost her aristocratic hold for 5 whole years.

In this aristocratic consular arrangement, next after the consuls themselves, were many prætors, lieutenants of the consuls and lord mayors of the provincial cities. These with the Romans were also generally the grandees who dispensed military force.²¹ "The insignia of the prætor were those common to the higher Roman magistrates—the purple-edged robe (toga prætexta), and the ivory chair (sella curulis). In Rome he was attended by two lictors, in the provinces by six." The curules or ivory sedans, were from the state four and six horse chariots and represent extraordinary power.

An example of the power exercised by the prætor over the poor slave, is given by us in another page, where a brave man in Sicily, for killing a dangerous wild boar, so excited his lordship's jealousy, that, taking advantage of an ancient law prohibiting persons of lowly birth from the use of the javelin, he ordered the trembling man to be crucified upon the spot. These prætors made use of the red color of labor for the brutal purposes of war, and it looks seriously as though this was a sort of cunning ruse or dodge, played upon the credulous, whereby to curry favor with the already powerfully organized numbers of labor.

Next after the consuls and prætors in the military pageant came the lictors. They wore the blue and azure cloak when in the field, which was the sagum caeruleum, epithet of death, darkness, night. In this garb the lictor's fierce military characteristics were personified. The grand magistrate's attendant, he strutted at the pageant in line of march, with a bundle of rods in his hand and held on high the formidable axe of execution, that the people might understand the presence of a sublime power and bow their heads in respect. If a criminal or malefactor was caught, his duty was to whip him with the scourges and cleave his head from his body with the axe.²²

²¹ Encyclopædia Britannica, Vol. XIX. p. 675.

²² Livy, I. 26. "Horatius cui soror virgo, quæ desponsa uni ex Curtiis fuerat, obvia ante portam Capenam fuit: cognitoque super humeros paludamento sponsi, quod ipsa confecerat, solvit crines, et flebiliter nomine sponsum mortuum appellat. Movet feroci juveni animum comploratio sororis in victoria sua tantoque gaudio publico. Stricto itaque gladio, simul verbis increpans. transigit puellum: 'Abi hinc cum immaturo amore ad sponsum, inquit * * * I lictor colliga manus quæ paullo ante armatæ imperium populo Romano pepererunt.'" The same ferocious order was given the lictor by the father of Manlius, (Livy, X liber VIII. cap. 7: "I. lictor deliga ad palum." A consul, prætor or other superior officers had the right to order a lictor to perform any execution.

But when there was peace and while they were in Rome, the lictors wore the toga, purple or purple-bordered, because the lictors must be of high-born stock; although the toga of the unions was red, brown or dark red. It corresponded in Italy to the himation in Greece; and was the color of the lowly class everywhere, representing peace, not war,²³ as seen in any Latin dictionary. This remarkable fact reveals itself more and more plainly as the arguments and material evidences upon which it is based, receive investigation. Full attention to the ancient communal inscriptions has not yet been given, partly on account of the fact that colors do not often survive even where they were painted on the tablets; but principally, because ensigns and emblems whose colors, being sacred were at all times universally conceded were never painted at all, but simply engraved on the stone or casting in the natural color of the material on which they were cut. But it must be borne in mind that the lictors who were required to be of the optimate class, wore only a purple-red, not the labor-red. This was a mixture of the genuine with the azure (cæruleus) or the white.

Thus color in ancient days, socially speaking, was a line of demarcation separating optimates from plebeians.²⁴ We have thus shown how in war the sagum and the vexil-

²³ See note —supra, on the red himation.

²⁴ See Guhl and Koner, Life of the Greeks and Romans, pp. 485-6: "The usual colour of the dress was originally white (for the toga this was required by law): only poor people, slaves and freedmen wore dresses of the natural brown or black colour of the wool." "In imperial times, however, even men adopted dresses of scarlet etc." * * * "The bride wears a reddish violet stola, adorned with an embroidered instita of darker hue." These are the poorer class, as they seem to come under the general remark quoted, viz: that only poor people, slaves and freedmen wore colors. Then (page 486), occurs this remark: "The outside of Perseus' dress is reddish brown, the inside white," as if to coax with the great rising element, while taking care to keep "pure" within, in difference to this fabulous royal potentate, son of the great cærulean Zeus. Speaking of the toga of Italy, or the himation of Greece, the same authors, p. 486 remark, that "Looked at straight, the blood-red dress thus prepared had a blackish tint: looked at from underneath, it showed a bright red color." Thus the toga no matter by whom worn, was red when it represented peace—a fact which remains good for all antiquity; while the regular war-colors were azure and blue or white and azure-blue. So again idem, p. 168, speaking of the Greek robes and other articles of apparel, and the pictures whence the information is taken, says: "Men also appear in these pictures, with the cherry-coloured chlamys and the red himation;" and speaking of the Mirpa or ancient turban, used also sometimes as a zone-belt, which was red, the same authors add: "The Oriental turban is undoubtedly a remnant of this custom." Here again we have an example of the power of habit, to transmit itself through indefinite periods of time. In another phrase, idem, p. 168, speaking of the plebeian class, is the expression: "The original colors, although (particular the reds) slightly altered by the burning process, may still be distinctly recognized."

lum in its original tints, were white, cærulean or azure and blue, in the field of war,²⁵ while the peace toga which was red and the vexillum when seen among the communes, were of a brilliant crimson. So also we have explained somewhat the manner in which in later ages of the republic the phenomenal love and reverence of the lowly class, so soon as they exhibited a political and military weight was taken advantage of and even adopted in sham in the Roman camp, seemingly to curry favor with this rising class. It now remains to further proceed in explanation of the Roman military pageant.

The next officers in rank after the lictor were sometimes the equites or knights on horseback; and their military pomp, when preceded by consuls, prætors and their lictors, as the latter bore aloft their prætorian bundles of whips and their hatchets and axes when going out of the gates to war, or returning in triumph from it, was a spectacle anything but flattering to the poor, to whose backs and necks the scourges and the axes were too often applied.

Another powerful argument substantiating the prevalence of red as an adopted color of the gods of industry, where peace and not war was intended, is seen in the typical goddess Pomona, another name perhaps for Ceres or Demeter, Isis, Cybele and other guardians of agricultural labor. She presided over the orchard fruits and the gardens, and her emblem, symbol or sign was a flaming red. This old Roman divinity had charge of fruit-orchards. In the deep forests she was adored by satyrs and other sylvan fairies.²⁶

Pomona stands out as an excellent corroboration to the argument that from the most ancient conceivable times red was the typical color for the symbols, emblems or banners of the strictly working people and shows furthermore, that to carry out the original idea of Pomona, a priest or priestess of a Pomona of to-day must be attired in a flaming red and must not represent strife; as her function is that of peace.²⁷ It was even forbidden on high penalty that her attendant servant or priest should look upon an army; strife being to her a terrible sin. He must even turn his head from the sight of soldiers.

²⁵ Cicero. In Pisonem, 23: "Togulæ lictoribus ad portam præsto fuerunt, quibus illi acceptis, sagula rejecerunt et catervam imperatori suo novam præbuerunt."

²⁶ Ovid. Metamorphoses, XIV. 623 seqq

²⁷ Guhl and Konor, Life of the Greeks and Romans, p. 536.

This divinity chose "from the plebs"²⁸ a priest called the Flamen Pomonalis. He was allowed to take a wife but could never be divorced from her; for that would be suggestive of strife. True to the typical color of the labor she represented, she was called flaminica, and she held in her hand a pruning knife, although this instrument is represented to have also been intended for sacrificing the lamb at the feasts of Pomona. She was robed in a chiton or himation, which in Rome was called a toga. It was made of wool, and was screened from the vulgar by a long veil, (flammeum), of a flaming red color or Phœnician glow,²⁹ typical of her plebeian estate. This Flaminica not only represented and presided over, but also performed, labor; for she busied herself in the toils of her husband, the flamen, in the work of the feasts and entertainments. The collegia were fond of celebrating by parading with flaming streamers and flags.

The worship of the sacred ibis has also something to do in this connection. It is mentioned in company with Pomona and was probably the sacred scarlet ibis, of the Egyptians, whose red colors have ever been unscientifically mixed or confounded with the flamingo. This bird, agreeably to its name, flamen, flaminica, flamingo was, especially all the wing part, of a fiery red (phoenicopteros). The imagination of the ancients pictured the red to be emblematic of love,³⁰ ardency and warmth; all of which were portrayed in the beams of the sun, and this impression chrystalized into a red color. But the aristocratic ²⁸ See Johnson's, Universal Cyclopædia, Vol. III. p. 1,328, Art. Pomona; Ovid, Metamorphoses, XIV. 623, says that she was courted by Pœmœnus another divinity of the Italian forests and gained her by a trick. It is also stated that Pomona had a citadel or seat among sacred groves near Ostia called the Pomonal and that she had a vicegerent or sacerdos—a man or perhaps woman chosen from among the laboring element, who had to rank last and lowest of the 15 flames of Rome. From Varro, Lingua Latina, V. 15, 25: " . . . flamines, quod in Latio, capite velato, erant semper ac caput cinctum habebant filo, flamines dicti."

²⁹ Consult Flaminius, sq. in any good Latin Lexicon; Guhl and Koner, p. 537

³⁰ So in Greek we have ἑρως for the heron presumably applied to both these birds the scarlet ibis and the flamingo sometimes adored for the scarlet or sacred ibis. But the ἑρως was a form of ἑρως signifying the flame of love. So Ardea, the Latin for heron the self-same bird, has its etymology in ardeo to burn and blaze. It may therefore be strongly suspected that Pomona and her flamines had something to do with the temple at Ardea near Rome burned by Æneas, and from whose ashes, phoenix-like, arose the wonderful red heron or phoenix. Nothing can gainsay this, for both ardea and φœnix are the flaming reds of Latin and Greek.

idea of the ego as known in the noble, opposed to the ignoble or plebeian, was always of an awe-striking or imposing hue, such as the white, azure, blue and gray.

Curiously enough the celebrated sacred scarlet ibis of the ancients is found more frequently in the Americas than on the Nile, which leads to a plausible conjecture that this heron was the flamingo, another red heron, migratory and common on the Nile. These well-known, gregarious red birds, "when feeding, or at rest, owing to their red plumage, have often been likened to a body of British soldiers."

It is thus shown that red is the chrystalization of all dark hues, while white, in primitive notions, was a state, purified altogether from color; and thus the true aristocratic symbol. Labor's warm, serum-reddened currents of love and life and manly vigor, together with its vast affixture of paraphernalia, which from the mythical ages clustered around this central color, was always based upon the opposite of those formidable, repellent hues residing in the awe-inspiring idea of nobility.

Persons inclined to doubt may here conceive an objection based in the fact that there was, common among the optimates, an aristocratic or imperial purple and that this purple was not only of a reddish hue but also an august color; so costly and grand that it could not be permitted by law to be worn, except by great dignitaries.

The answer to this objection is, however, easily met. In very ancient times owing to the popularity of the communal cult, an enormous trade and manufacture of the Tyrian red and purple was carried on. That nobody but the great masses dealt in this trade is evident from the fact that after the rise of the proletarian power, Rome began a conquest ending only in the massacre, subjugation and enslavement of these millions who had sustained the trade. Rome, probably to curry favor with her "dangerous class" at home, and after she had reduced the world by conquest, passed a law making it a crime for anybody to use the red except the nobles. After this law went into force in Phœnicia the workingmen engaged in the great and wide-spread trade of dyeing, so completely lost their business, that even the secret of their ancient and beautiful hues was lost and it has never been recovered to this day.³² Now this all proves that, agreeably to our views previously expressed, the purple came in vogue with the power of the plebs, who had this beautiful color; since these great conquests abroad commenced less than 200 years before Christ. All agree with Polybius³³ who, himself one of the victims of these conquests, devotes pages to an account of the origin of Roman degeneracy. When Rome suppressed the manufacture of the hated red color of the organized communes she herself adroitly donned the purple of labor's goddess—"the brilliantly tinted garments" of the priests of Isis and Osiris, of Ceres and Demeter, of Pomona and her flaminica, for "a mantle of a Roman emperor." So that while it is easy to show that in later times, when Rome was tumbling into that great slave-holding period which brought degeneracy and death, she intriguingly filched the beautiful color, and after streaking it with the old aristocratic gray and adulterating it with blue or white or azure, she gave it to her lords and ladies; its makers with their aged secret, she gave to the wild beasts of the gladiatorial games to be "butchered for a Roman holiday." But it is not easy to prove that the purple containing the red was used by the imperatores before the conquests. True, it is so mentioned; but it was not the red-purple—only the azure-blue which received this name.

²¹ Encyclopædia Britannica, Vol. IX, p. 250.

It is not in the scheme of these arguments to attempt a polemic for or against the primitive notions of mankind in regard to the choice of colors. We find species of innocent consistency all through. As white was the essence or chrysalis of discolor, symbolizing purity, aristocracy—to agathoteron, the better part, while its nuances of beautiful blue, its silvered gray and azure, all pointed to the ethereal sky, lofty, forbidding and sublime, so red, among the divinities of a yielding or producing race, was the essence or chrysalization of all color, from the murky smut of earth to brown and dun at last reaching the gorgeous.

³² Consult Encyclopædia Britannica, Vol. VII. p. 498.

³³ Polybius, in his Histories, distinctly states that the decline of the Roman honor and virtue began with these conquests. For modern opinion on the date of Roman decline see Bücher Aufstände der Unfreien Arbeiter, where numerous valuable quotations are made from Polybius, Athenæus and others, will be found of much interest, shedding a new light upon the subject.

scarlet and the crimson coma of Apollo,³⁴ or the flaming chiton, chlamys, himation or toga, believed to be the trailing robes of Demeter and her red silk, flame-clad daughter Proserpine and all the other protecting goddesses of labor and its products. This consistency, in harmony with Plato on the one hand and Aristotle on the other, is borne out alike by science, and by trial of an immemorial duration.

The Christians when they afterwards came, adopted the red, wherever they planted among the communes; and in our next chapter we shall show this to have been the case at almost every instance, in their earlier career. So soon as priest-power showed itself the old white came back; and accordingly we find the white standard at Rome, while the red banner remains at Auvergne, Paris and London, with its gules in England and its gueules in France. Everything throwing light upon the subject, shows the same preference of mediæval guilds, for red among the poorer or working class who learned to adopt Christianity because unlike the old Paganism, it declared for the gradual emancipation of slaves. And they have never to this day, given up their pristinè banner.

We have mentioned the extreme antiquity of the red color as applied to ensigns, symbols, signs and types of the plebeian classes. These curious facts came down to us through the industry-protecting priesthood when they appear in histories and geographies, and through inscriptions, when they appear as relics of the proletaries themselves. This priesthood which transmits the records of the red color is, so far as we have been able to ascertain, only that of Minerva, goddess of mechanical labor and laborers, and Ceres, goddess, or tutelary divinity who controlled agriculture.³⁵ These great mythical powers, implicitly believed in for so many ages, had different names in different countries; but preserved with a wonderful uniformity the same functions everywhere.

We carry the investigation to England, the ancient Britannia, now known through cumulative evidence of comparative history, to be as ancient as Greece or Egypt, and centuries older than Rome.

³⁴ There has been found (see Encyclopædia Britannica, Vol. II. Art. Apollo), a fine round bronze head of Apollo stamped on the silver coin of Clazomenæ, preserved in the British Museum. This venerable midget is a curiosity.

³⁵ See Gerhard, Antike Denkmäler with Tafel, CXX. 1, showing image of Cybele in her chariot with lions and two figures clad in the toga.

Exactly as in the case of Greece and Rome, the aristocratic and Druidical priests were clothed in white,³⁶ so likewise the Druids of the aristocratic religion, like the southern European, are found to have been the most cruel and bloodthirsty of the ancients, nurturing the practice of slavery and the sacrifice of human beings. In fact these abominable atrocities were found later by the Romans to so far surpass their own spirit of cruelty³⁷ that they sent Agricola to their fastness in the island of Mona with an army, who so completely destroyed them that they never again arose to become a great power. The account of the ferocity of this ancient aristocratic priest-power of the Druids, in their methods of human sacrifice is too shocking to be recounted.³⁸

But notwithstanding the fact that priests of the state religion of ancient England were clad in white, the common or popular faith was that of sun-worship. Apollo, with all his relationship by similarity of functions, to Ceres, on the one hand, and Minerva on the other, was a protector and patron of industry by reason of his being the sun himself. He blazed forth with wondrous beams of crimson over old England as well as Europe and Asia, and was early the myth of that land and its people.³⁹ Perhaps there were two sets of opinions, one opposing the other among the Druids.

This blazing Phœbus, with his transcendental effulgence had to be imitated in the symbols of human labor; and how to make the crimson dyes of his train of deities was no small matter. But here the land of the Britons comes ³⁶ Hughes, Horæ Britannicæ, Vol. I. p. 158: "The Druid priest wore a white robe, and the bard sky-blue but the Ovati, green. These different colours, were, the first, the emblem of purity and peace; the other, of truth, and the last, the verdent dress of nature, in the meads and woods." They sacrificed human beings and white bulls.

³⁷ Campbell, Political Survey, I. p. 525; III. p. 292; IV. pp. 475, 480. Wm. Camden, Britannia, Druides; Borlase, Cornwall.

³⁸ We refer the reader to Hughes, Horæ Britannicæ, Vol. I. pp. 232-250, who derives the facts contained in his dissertation, from Tacitus, Annales, XIV. cap. 29, for the Britons and Lucan, for the grove of sacrifice at Marseilles in Gaul.

³⁹ Consult Idem, p. 261. The Stonehenge Britons were sun-worshippers; that is, they deified the god of blaze. Minerva was their protectress of invention and manual labor. Stonehenge appears to have been an enormous temple, built of heavy rocks and fashioned in a semi-circle, having no roof. For a full description of Stonehenge, its structure and its surrounding influences, see idem, pp. 258-261.

in for a share of our observation; for it furnished the tin of which the dye was made. After the Phœnicians found the tin mines of Cornwall and the Scilly Isles (the cassiterides), red colors were mostly produced in Sidon and Tyre, their southern home.

Now, without enlarging upon this matter as touching the earlier use of the red colors of England and the origin of the British gules, let us look at the phenomenal manner in which the habit of red colors has clung to these people. Every one familiar with the heraldic symbols has observed the frequent mention of the gules.⁴⁰ This, during the mediæval age, was a favorite color with the common people.

It would be well to show, in company with the English guilds, those also of the French, who are derived from the ancient Gauls. The reason of this is, that the trade union system of the Romans, elsewhere elaborately described, struck into England about the same time that it was popular in Gaul; and as the unions used the banner at Rome, the practice extended to Britain and Gaul.

The Crispins, who founded the order of shoemakers at Soissons, are the first unions we know of in the north of France. The story of the brothers Crispin and Crispinius belongs to the bloody days of Diocletian⁴¹ whose terrible persecution of the early Christians added them as victims of martyrdom; and they have ever since been the tutelary divinities or patrons, guarding the shoemakers' art—another example of the power of superstition to perpetuate itself through the generations. So the shoemakers took the red flag; for we have a beautiful illustration of the color of the shoemakers' flag in the province of Auvergne, given us by Bouillet, in which are massed numbers of banners that were used by many trade organizations during the middle ages down to their suppression in 1789.⁴²

⁴⁰ See Encyclopædia Britannica, Vol. XI. p. 616, 9th edition, Art. Heraldry; Here, in a cut (fig. 3), in which 9 escutcheons are represented, 3 are of a red color, one being a genuine gules. The art of dyeing brilliant colors is very ancient. The chasuble or red mummy cloth found A. D. 1295 now in St. Paul's Cathedral, London, which is "purpureo aliquantulum sanguineo," proves that the older Phœnix purple was blood red. Comp. idem, Vol. XVIII. p. 817. The celebrated tin dyes of the Phœnicians owed much to Britain. Consult Hughes, Horæ Britannicæ, Vol. I. p. 47. It colored the finest textiles a pure red. This was going on long before Abraham or the Trojan war; and Britain yielded the tin for the scarlet dyes.

⁴¹ Consult chapter xi. pp. 372-388, of our History of the Ancient Trade Unions.

⁴² Histoire des Communautés des Arts et Métiers de l' Auvergne, Accompagnée des

The cordonniers or shoemakers, of the middle ages and down to their suppression, were in all respects the same as in A. D. 280, when founded by St. Crispin and his brother, who are said to have stolen the leather or raw material in their zeal to make shoes for the poor. They even retain the same name. They held the same day of the same year (October 25th), for their feasts, parades and conventional jubilees, and carried the same red banner. This is the flag which the law of Theodosius excused on account of the men having been guilty of no wrong, and having always been "found peaceful, pious and upright."⁴³ The French called the flag or standard-bearer of these unions a porte-bannière, the Romans a signifer. These banner-bearers or more probably banner makers had a union by themselves; for a magistrate or president is found in an old inscription,⁴⁴ bearing words to that effect. Returning to the trustworthy member of the Legion of Honor and of the Institute, M. Bouillet, we find him presenting the red flag of the shoemakers of the middle ages and later, categorically somewhat as follows:

In Auvergne, city of Brioude with its antique social curiosities and its communal college, the shoemakers had their union amalgamated with the tanners, glove makers, furriers and cobblers.⁴⁵ Their banner, alike for these four trades, was all blood red, except a border of gold and a gilt fox's pelt hanging in the center. The staff was gilt and hung with beautiful tassels. An exquisite picture of this banner is given in plate 33, fig. 2.

In the old town of Ambert, department of Puy de Dôme, the shoemakers were amalgamated with the saddle Bannières que portaient ces Communautés avant 1789. Par J. B. Bouillet, Paris, 1857.

⁴³ Codes Theodosii, Notul. Gothof. leg. 2, tit. vii lib. XIV. De Excusationibus Artificum. "Signiferi, . . . qui scilicet signa, et in his deorum, ferebant in pompis, festis, ludicris gentilicis." etc.

⁴⁴ Muratorius, Thesaurus Veterum Inscriptionum, 25, 50; Granier. Histoire des Classes Ouvrières, p. 323: "Vénérable corps des maîtres porte-bannières aux fêtes, et de leurs nombreux variétés, depuis les signiferi, qui sont le genre jusqu'aux cantabrarii qui sont l'espèce." Comp. Orell, Inscriptionum Latinarum Collectio, No. 4,282.

⁴⁵ Bouillet, Communautés, p. 109, describes the relations of the shoemakers with the cobblers as follows: "On comprendra facilement qu'il a du arriver de vives contestations entre les deux corps de métiers, de cordonniers et de savetiers; les uns achetaient des bottes ou des souliers vieux, les autres confectionnaient certains articles de leur état, hors des conditions prescrites par leur règlement, aussi les cours et tribunaux entendirent souvent leurs griefs pour ces faits ou pour les visites des uns chez les autres."

and bridle makers.⁴⁶ Their ensign, shown in plate 12, fig. 1, was of the same shape as that of Brioude; about one-half of the surface of the canvass within the border was of a brilliant red color. The whole banner was red, blue and gold.

An exquisite red banner was that of the shoemakers of Clermont. In the center of a similarly escutcheon-shaped canvass is a shoe-knife with gilt handle and steel colored blade of nearly the same shape that we see to-day in any shoeshop. A gold border shiningly fringed, the whole, except the top and like the others, the standard and tassels were gilt. All the canvass is a flaming red. It presents, indeed a beautiful exhibit of the old French oriflamme and the older, pre-Christian FLAG and flamma which we have described as the ensign hues of the workmen's goddesses, so familiar and so endeared to the Latin lowly race.⁴⁷

The ancient city of Nemetum and seat of the Cæsars, Augustonemetum, which was one of the early Christian centers (A. D. 250), became the Clermont-Ferrand of the present day. Here the collegia and communes of the early Christians long ago planted and always maintained themselves even through the persecutions of Diocletian and Maximian. No place seems to have more warmly cultivated the ancient, or rejected the innovations of modern life, than Clermont. The foregoing description of the shoemakers of Clermont is given by Bouillet.⁴⁸ Momm- sen, in his history of Rome, makes this volcanic and ster-

⁴⁶ Idem, p. 110, and plate 12, fig. 1. "Leur bannière portait :

"Tiercé en pal : ar. — er de gueules, à un conteau à pied d'argent, emmanché d'or etc., et au 3 d'or, à une bride de cheval de gueules."

⁴⁷ It may be well here to quote some of the definitions of the English gules, French gueules, Latin, gulae because though somewhat rare, they appear in ancient and mediæval heraldry: Stormouth, English Dictionary: GULES, noun, plural, pronounced guls. [French gueules, red or sanguine in blazon—from gueule, mouth, the throat], in heraldry, a term denoting red, represented in engravings in upright lines.

Worcester, English Dictionary, (Unabridged), defines it thus: GULES, (gulz) n. Fr. gueules.—L, gula the throat; or the Ar. gula, a rose, Fairholt—"Corruption of gueules, red Fr, which is probably from the Pers. guhl, a rose."

Webster, English Dictionary, (Unabridged): "GULES, (guls), n. [Fr. gueules, from Lat. gula, reddened skin]. (Her.) A red color—intended, perhaps, to represent courage, animation or hardihood, and indicated in engraved figures of escutcheons and the like, by straight perpendicular lines."

⁴⁸ Bouillet, Communautes d'Auvergne, plate 11, fig. 3. On p. 110, is the description as follows: "A Clermont: De gueules, à un tranchet à lame d'argent emmanché d'or."

ile region of Auvergne an example in proof that the introduction of modern innovations would result in the place becoming uninhabitable,⁴⁹ although it has withstood many misfortunes, natural and ecclesiastical, and is yet a populous and thriving region. Here, where ancient customs have so tenaciously clung, we find them near the close of the last century, still with their flaming red banner; and no amount of prejudice could change the working people from its use at the feasts and parades, just as they were doing in the days of Socrates or Tiberius Gracchus.

One banner was a flaming red without a spot or blemish of any other color except in the center, where stood the Virgin Mary, dressed in silver gray, holding in her arms the naked infant. It symbolizes the peaceful handicraft of the shoemakers, carders, weavers and several others. This central picture of the Madonna or Notre Dame, holding the new-born child, as represented on the plate, is artistic; and standing upon a background of gorgeous red, presents with its gold fringes, its slender staff and its tassels, an admirable piece of art.⁵⁰ Among the various unions amalgamated under this banner were the masons; thus showing the red banner to have been an emblem of that trade.

We do not pretend to say that all the shoemakers of the mediæval ages used the red flag. Notable exceptions are given in plates 9, fig. 2, of the city of Maringues, and plate 11, fig. 4, of Riom, but nearly all of those given retain this color. Out of the eight shoemakers' unions represented on the plates no less than five sported the red color, some of them retaining the peace-hues of the divinities unalloyed by anything except the device of the craft, generally placed in the center of the canvass.

In England we likewise find the gules upon thousands of escutcheons from as early as Constantine the Great. It is there yet. The habit of holding up the red as a symbol of some tutelary divinity—nobody knows what because everybody has forgotten—clings to the British Isles with a stubborn tenacity to this day. How comes it that the military coat is red? That French soldiers in parade look like a prairie on fire? That in blazonry the standards, and in shipping, the streamers, pennons, jacks and merchant-standards,⁵¹ especially those representing peace, so many are of this color? The reasons for it are two-fold. First, they are the most conspicuous and beautiful and consequently the best. As proof of this we find in America and elsewhere the blood red storm signals, in Switzerland the red arms, in Denmark, Great Britain, Norway, Turkey, Morocco, Peru, Chili, Bolivia and many other countries, the red merchants flags and ensigns; red occupying almost the entire surface of the canvass. So also, the British jack.

⁴⁹ History of Rome, (Eng. trans.), Vol. I. p. 62, quotes Dureau de la Malle, Economie Politique des Romains, II. p. 226. In this passage it is mentioned that such sights as a woman yoked or harnessed by the side of a cow, are still of common occurrence.

⁵⁰ See plate 12, fig. 2, of Bouillet, Histoire des Communautés des Arts et Métiers. The description of the plate is on pages 110-111, as follows: "À Montferrand, les cordonniers, réunis aux cardeurs, aux tisserands, aux marchands revendeurs aux hôteliers, aux maçons, etc., portaient une bannière: De gueules, à Notre-Dame d'argent, couronnée d'or."

In the next place, these were the colors originally employed to represent the same object in ancient times when, in the imagination of men, red was believed to be holy like the gorgeous streams of light from the rising or setting sun, which shaped itself on the simple, primeval mind, into an omnipotent being with human form, like Apollo and Ceres, who were believed to be guardians of labor and its products. If then, it is the best, is still used because best, and if, after a trial of an æon of time it be found that the lowly class thus symbolized by it, judged rightly ten thousand years ago, and have preserved it in their unions and hearts through this long period, can there be any consistency in a paltry, time-serving-prejudice or its tricks and intolerant schemes against it? We leave this question to science.

We are told by antiquarians that when the Romans settled Kent, called by them Cantiopolis, large numbers of the trade unionists came from Italy and there established themselves; and engaging with the natives in the arts of brass and woodwork, taught them the use of the turning lathe and other machinery. So we find this section the chosen nucleus of several trade unions at this day; and right here and in London an hour's walk up the Thames is where the typical British gules is found in greatest abundance; for the same phenomenon of transmission makes London the bed-rock of modern socialism. Previously to the introduction of the mechanic arts this territory was a wilderness; and the people lived in tents, hovels, huts and caves, in the rudest state, almost without clothes or houses. Romans taught and helped them to construct habitations, married with them and mixed, as is now becoming known, planting among them all their home habits and customs." Many of these Romans on their long journey through Gaul to Britain, lingered on the way; and those were the workingmen who planted the flag in such places as Auvergne; for Romans were in England 55 years before Christ. We will therefore suppose that if they planted it in Auvergne they did so in Kent, and having less positive evidence from the latter we allow ourselves to draw comparisons by what we positively know of the former, which was a way-station of the Italian emigrants.

⁵¹ See Encyclopædia Britannica, Vol. IX. pp. 241-245 Art. Flag. Let the reader open a late edition of Webster or Worcester's Unabridged Dictionary to the word flag, and his eye will meet as it were, a flame of fire.

As we have spoken of carpenters, let us take this trade in evidence. Drawing from Bouillet who has so faithfully worked this territory, we find the red banner to have been used by them as follows: Carpenters with patron Saint Joseph and with day of celebrations, the 19th of March, (March was the natal month of Ceres, Minerva and Apollo)."

Taking all the principal trades we might suppose to have been introduced into Kent and London at the same time that they existed in Auvergne, we find that in the latter place, the bakers' annual feast days were in the spring of the year, corresponding to the festival days of Ceres, goddess of grain-growing, and Dionysus and the other labor gods. Here we have in Bouillet's portrayal of the trades unions of Auvergne, six banners in red out of eleven mentioned for the bakers, and the six red flags were for the towns of Ambert, Brioude, Issoire and Thiers, where the flag was all red except the central device; and Riom and Saint-Flour, where they painted a part only of its surface in red.

⁵² Comp. E. H. Rogers' correct and able statement in McNeill's Labor Problem of to-day, p. 385, drawing from Coote, Romans of Britain. "Rome held possession of the island more than 400 years, and it was never abandoned by those descended from the Romans." Mr. Rogers speaks of the mechanics who early emigrated to Massachusetts, as the "Men of Kent."

⁵³ Histoire des Communautés des Arts et Métiers d'Auvergne, pp. 80-83: "On peut faire une étude très curieuse du rôle que joua la charpenterie militaire, dans la seconde expédition de Pépin-le-Bref, en 761. contre Galfre, duc d'Aquitaine. Au siège qu'il fit subir à la ville de Clermont, profitant de l'expérience des Lombards, il fit dresser contre les murs de formidables béliers, des poutres énormes qui, mises en mouvement par des leviers et des cordages et roulant sur des cylindres, par l'impulsion que leur donnaient les charpentiers et leurs habiles ouvriers, heurtaient de leur front de fer les murailles et les mettaient en pièces. On peut le voir encore dans d'autres sièges que soutinrent Clermont et Montferrand en 1121 et 1126."

Turning to Depping,⁶⁴ and Sheppard who wrote a curious statement on guild laws in 1650, at London, we find that there were unions in both London and Paris during the same period, or from the time of Constantine the Great; and if so, the habits of the people of Auvergne must have been about the same as those of the Parisians and Londoners because France was the territory of the overland emigration from Italy. The red banner appears to have been colored after the tutelary divinities or patron saints whose feast days still corresponded with those of the proto-divinities, tenaciously conserved through the ages, from the myths by the power of habit.

But we may follow this interesting subject farther, taking the various other trades together. Beginning with towns that adopted a banner as their device for arts and trades in general, we find at Langheac, the flag half red; Chaudesaigues, half red; Pont du Chateau, half red; Vio, Vic-le-Comte and Saint Germain, largely red; while many of the trades residing in these towns had all red for their banner.

In Mont-Ferrand, the carders, masons, weavers, small dealers and tavern keepers had blood red. In Aurillac and Riom, the saddle and bridle makers, confectioners, cheese handlers, locksmiths, shoemakers, cutlers and silk workers all had red and a number a bright fiery color all over except the device.

At Theirs, the marble cutters, glaziers and cutters had all red. At Ambert, besides the shoemakers, already mentioned, the saddle and bridle makers and weavers had a red banner, or one with more or less red on it.

Clermont de Courrières and Saint Germain-Lembron had total red except central device. So Saint Germain, the celebrated industrial suburb of Paris named, as it appears from this more aged labor-hive of southwest France, still clings to, and fights for, its ideal red as a tutelary or patron color.

⁶⁴ G. B. Depping. Règlement sur les Arts et Métiers de Paris, this author quotes a state regulation covering the same period, which is curious as showing the honesty of freedmen from tricks such as characterize the present competitive system, causing much adulteration of manufactures.

The tutelary banner of Pierrefort, had the top red far enough down to cover more than one third of its surface, the rest having several common colors but no white.

At Clermont-Ferrand the joiners had a red plane, and the marble-cutters other similar red objects for a device, while at Brioude, shoemakers, tavern keepers, tanners, glove makers, furriers and cobblers, had each all flaming red, and their parades, which used to be celebrated on the 11th of November, must have been a sightly spectacle indeed, all through the middle ages. They were devout Christians although their worship had differentiated in course of time from that of Minerva whose feast day was the same time of the year, whose colors were the same, and whose cult had only changed from that of a tutelary heathen divinity, to that of a Christian patron.

The banner of the painters of Montaigut was entirely of a blazing red. Hatters and glaziers of Saint Flour had their banner red at the top; and the hatters, saddlers, tanners, butchers and tavern keepers of Issoire had a great red ring like the sun's corona. Surgeons and apothecaries, so well-known to have been classed among the plebs in former times, had all red banners in Aurillac. The tanners, glove makers and curriers of this place also flamed in the same color.⁶⁶

Abundance of other evidence might be here brought forward; for the immense field of Europe is scarcely yet entered upon.

If any one should still contend that the red flag or the red color was warlike and antagonistical to life and its peaceful pursuits and labors, let him further observe the fact that in those lands where the communes left their traces most plentifully on their inscriptions, will be found the red banner to this day. Modern Turkey occupies one of these localities. And what is the merchant standard of modern Turkey? A blood red color tinges every shred of the canvass except an exiguous star and a tiny crescent moon, the wife of the flaming Apollo! Certainly no warfare is symbolized in the peaceful standard of a merchant vessel.

⁶⁶ See Index and plates of Bouillet, Histoire des Communes des Artes et M^{ét}iers de L'Auvergne, where still more material may be found to confirm these statements.

Morocco, Algiers and Tunis, the north coast of Africa, once occupied by the Carthagenians and other colonies of Phœnicians, still have a flag which is totally red. When the origin of this habit is traced, it will be revealed that Baal, the great divinity of the Phœnicians, whose attributes were the same as Ceres, whose colors were red, whose home was that of the inventive and ingenious dyers, and who was the tutelary divinity or patron of labor, was the huge sun-god that inspired the color by his glowing beams.

The northern coast of Africa was colonized by the Punic race whose name both in Greek and Latin is the every day word for red. Both Turkey, which succeeded to Græco-Phœnician domination in Asia, and Morocco, Tunis and Algiers, which succeeded to Carthaginian rule and influence, still retain for this peace-color the red in its altogether unadulterated state.

Spain, the ancient Iberia, a colony of Phœnicia which also planted the red banner in the land of Viriathus, conveyed this habit to Peru, where we still find the banner and merchant standard all red, except a white stripe through the middle. In Egypt the peace-standard is blood red with the exception of a crescent of the moon.

Great Britain, likewise a colony of Phœnicia so ancient that the records descend to us only in the tin tincture furnished by her mines, of which the red dyes were made, preserves to this day an otherwise unaccountable habit of displaying the red gules, and her merchant standard is all red except a corner and even this is partly red. The Romans who later settled Britain only confirmed the same habit; since the labor communes of Rome had borrowed their tutelary divinities from Asia.

Thus Phœnicia whose æons of antiquity make her the proto-nursery of man along with central Asia, is alike, the home of Baal "the sun-god, conceived as the male principal of life and reproduction in nature,"⁶⁶ and the mother of almost all the colonies where sunbeams paint the future flags and banners of the myriads of toil whose communal culture was one of peace, equality and good will to man.

⁶⁶ Encyclopædia Britannica, Vol. III. p. 152.

Very much more evidence might be adduced in proof of the red banner having descended to the working family of man, as a legacy from ancient usages religions and beliefs; and showing that while memory and use have traditionally adhered, the superstitious reasons for much, have long been forgotten, though the economical reasons have remained. We submit these curious points to further study by antiquaries with the remark that the most striking feature of these phenomena is, that feast-days of the middle ages correspond for the peculiar crafts, very nearly with those of the same crafts and same divinities in the remotest antiquity of which we have been able to trace traditional and palæographic records.

CHAPTER XXIII.

THE TRUE MESSIAH.

FOUNDERS OF GREAT INSTITUTIONS COMPARED

HOW THE REAL MESSIAH found Things at His Advent on Earth—Palestine—Syria—Rhodes and the Islands—Suffering Condition of Labor—Seeds of the Revolution already Sown—Further Analysis of the Conditions—The Eranoi and Thiasoi
—Orgeons and Essenes—Falsehoods regarding the Bacchantes.

AFTER 417 years, from the strike of the 20,000 miners and artisans at the Laurian mines in Greece, and 70 years from the last strike-war—that of the gladiators under Spartacus in Italy—there arose an orator out of the laboring class, who in Judea in an open air meeting, probably before a great assemblage, told the world that resistance to evil by means of bloody uprisings, was fraught with failure. Undoubtedly having in mind those terrible scenes we have pictured in these chapters, this foremost of orators and teachers proclaimed at the mass meeting these words:

“Ye have heard that it hath been said (by them of old time), an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth; but I say unto you that ye resist not evil but whosoever shall smite thee on thy right cheek, turn him the other also.”¹ Strange words! Inapplicable to this seething world. They were intended for some microcosm; some perfected state—the realized heaven on earth. In the competitive world to-day, Christian as it pretends to be, the old fighting eye for eye and tooth for tooth prevails, ever will prevail; to talk otherwise is absurd except in the deep penetralia where that heaven is realized.

¹ Matthew, V. 38-39.

By taking these strange words in the light of true social science and reasoning upon their meaning from the point of view in which these pages are written, we may perhaps understand their import. Otherwise the task is difficult. Nations continue to demand an eye for an eye. Communities do the same. Even families, despite their consanguine ties, cannot but continue to enslave and often destroy each other. Individuals stand over-against each other in mocking and bitter competition. the shrewdest or most favored survive while the majorities languish and fail.

Jesus when he said these words was in the act of creating an association; and that association actually continued for 300 years practicing the precepts of its founder. It was no new thing. It had existed for centuries before; it existed then. What he did was to bring out into the open world that which had so long been secret.

It was at a moment when such doctrines were comprehensible to the masses. Notions of the Messiah existed everywhere and the deep religious tinge was indispensable. The irascible world had many a tilt with the terrible monster of competition whose religion had been deeply based upon human slavery and the grasp for acquisition was still so strong that although the principle of equality and hence of emancipation of labor from its degradation, has never even to this day been relinquished, it did not obtain for many ages. Through this great movement a ponderous, revolutionary blow certainly fell upon the old competitive system. But that blow though ultimately fatal, did not kill the monster on the spot. He still lingers and is to-day struggling in a temporary hope and exultation although nearly 2,000 years have elapsed since the word went forth against him.

It cannot be considered in any other light than that the revolutionary events treated in foregoing chapters, followed by the enormous wave of reform of the early Christians, produced a tremendous syncope or swoon; that an atrophy supervened; and that they benumbed the whole social organism of the great Indo-European race. The dark ages into which our race sank, after the adoption of Christianity and its ratification and legalization by Constantine must ever be considered a phenomenon under any other reasoning than that this task it undertook was too prodigious for its powers. Æons of time were necessary to accomplish so vast a revolution. To overwhelm the great aristocratic Pagan religion with its array of traditions; to engulf and annihilate its obstinate cult; to emancipate the two-thirds majority on whose ill-paid labor it had feasted, glutted itself and grown monstrous in bulk and arrogance, was a task so profound that although actually undertaken, it caused a reaction, rolling up moral and intellectual billows so high that the ages and the nations were swept into a terrible jargon of dogmas tyrannies and bloody, inquisitorial intolerance which destroyed the virility of the race for more than a thousand years. And even now, after so many centuries, the end of the convulsions is far off, though hopefully approaching.

All struggles embracing deep principles are attended by qualms, swoons and upheavals. The numberless combatants who fell back in the swooning period that settled upon the human race after the Council of Nice with its mongrel Christianity, its idolatry, priestcraft and despotism, are emerging with higher hopes and broader views; their armor, the mechanics of their own invention, reduplicated by their own labor, wielded by their own hands and brain and their manhood cleared of doubts and superstitions—those deadly misgivings of the ancients. No one to-day asks more than Jesus did; for equal liberty, universal freedom and common ownership, with his sublime love and inter-care are quite enough. Squadrons innumerable thus armed and outfitted are, in our bright, regenerate century, returning to the conflict against the aged, competitive and long successful enemy of equal advantages and equal care. The conflict in this second coming may be long, hopefully in our own land bloodless, because fought with arguments, organization, diplomacy and law.

We have sketched several of the most renowned governments and ideal governments of the ancients. They all, having their foundation upon competition and its natural partiality, turned against the laboring people on whom they fed. They failed and came to naught. What there was in them of good could not obtain because they insulted and disrespected labor and degraded the working people on whom they existed from day to day. Nature tolerated some of them for a fair trial but they have disappeared and are no more. Jesus came and advocated another form based upon equality and brotherhood.

But before further considering the form established by the lowly workingman let us look honestly and squarely at the condition in which he found things.

All Asia Minor was the scene of labor organizations, Canaan by no means excepted. The Phœnicians who boasted an antiquity of 30,000 years,² occupied the land of Canaan on the Mediterranean Sea, in which country Jesus lived and passed the greater part of his life. These Canaanites appear before the researches of modern archaeologists and historians to have been among the first who possessed labor organizations. In giving a sketch of several ancient forms of government, we have simply described the competitive system, ancient and modern. Even the plans of Lycurgus and Numa failed altogether of affecting the revolution by which we mean the complete change from the old Pagan central idea of slavery to one of social and economic equality. There was no socialism beyond that of the family, in the government instituted in the idea of common ownership, communal intercourse, common tables and impartial distribution of land, as arranged by Lycurgus and afterwards shadowed by Plato and Aristotle. Every idea of true socialism was utterly neutralized by their hostility to laborers. The gymnastics which took the place of physical energy supplied by well regulated labor, and no better for the bodily health and development, was less natural, more straining and far less satisfactory.

In point of true national economy, government and labor cannot remain separate. By the governments mentioned, labor was disgraced, the laborer denied instruction, enslaved. Who then, were the citizens? Who the people? An oligarchy consisting of one-third of the population. An imperious, oligarchy of landlords. The condition of Ireland or England, wherever worst overrun and monopolized by landlords to-day, is better. Again, so far as the family socialism is concerned it was still more pernicious; for it was hypocritically an acquiescence in the ancient aristocracy existing among the highest class, everywhere in the right of the first-born son. Lycurgus recognized this arch aristocracy in forbidding kings and a few select individuals from indulging in the voluptuous interchange of loves. As in the traditional Pagan family, the king like the paterfamilias, was the breeder of kings. The mass of the people were left without sacred or holy honors. By people we mean the citizens and favored owners, or rather the protected, recognized and favored of the state. What then, shall be said of the workers? Summing it all up, these governments were exactly what they turned out to be—the quintessence of competitive forms, breeding disunion and corruption, thus coaxing on their own dissolution.

² Africanus, In Syncellus, p. 31.

But seeds of the true revolution were, from the earliest antiquity inherent in the labor organizations, which during these abortive efforts of aristocratic lawgivers and teachers, quietly existed in the midst of them. Had there existed only a few of these societies there would be no need here of pressing our subject. It would be allowed to slumber forever unmentioned. But they were innumerable. Comparative palæography indeed finds a new theme amongst them for the dignity of the labor problem; for it casts a fresh and charming color into the hitherto dry reading of annals.

But the fact that they were so numerous as to exist in thousands and perhaps millions and that their quiet existence covered unknown ages of time, is far less significant than the fact that they all seem to have possessed the kernel, not of the dishonest and hypocritical, but of the honest and real socialism, such as Jesus and the early Christians struggled to plant as the ultimate plan for all men to follow. They were all certainly alike in helping each other, in respecting and honoring labor and laborers, in co-operating for mutual aid, in a perfectly democratic form of religion though they were, in their credulous simplicity, constantly borrowing from the great grandees, their tutelary deities or patron saints. Whatever or wherever their tutelary god, one thing is universally observed—an uncompromising belief in, and a practical devotion to, the rougher forms of brotherhood. They had lived the revolution for unnumbered generations before Jesus came to sweep it, by one magnetic and amazingly omnipotent stroke, out of its modest secrecy into the open blaze of maddened, gnashing public opinion and fling it upon the warring tempests of the aged competitive system, the foundation rock of paganism.

It is a significant fact that Jesus should appear to the world in Phœnicia or Canaan which was at that time the wreck of the greatest nation of freebooters, buccaneers and kidnappers the world has ever known. From the earliest record these people were marauders and their world-wide successes legalized their daring and made them powerful pirates by sea and brigands by land.

But there was an inner history of these people which the pen of chroniclers has left unsketched. Great numbers of persons from all parts of the known world were kidnapped by their cruising corsairs, brought to the Phœnician shores and sold to the wealthy for slaves. These slaves, shortly before the advent of Christ, formed over two-thirds of the population. They were maltreated, made to do menial work, forced to till the lands, especially detailed to perform all the severe bodily toil in and out of the cities, their handsomest youths were made eunuchs and apportioned to the service of the ladies of high estate, and their young girls, disallowed an education and brought up in slavery and dirt, yielded not only to labor but became susceptible to the offers of the unprincipled and voluptuous among the rich. The condition of the ancient Phœnician slaves was indeed a degraded one. In nearly all the towns of Canaan or Phœnicia, Syria and Asia Minor, as well as in the islands, slaves were the rule; the free working people³ the exception. The cruel taint which blasted the toiler extended its devil-fingers beyond Greece over the Ægean sea and pointed at the Asiatic workman as a mark for its curse.⁴

In Egypt,⁵ Greece,⁶ Rome, Judea,⁷ Syria,⁸ Syracuse

³ Drumann, Arbeiter und Communisten, p. 24. "In Epidamnos gab es keine Handwerker als die öffentlichen Sklaven. Das Handwerk ist daher verrufen und verachtet u. in manchen Städten den Bürgern verboten."

⁴ Plato, Econ., 4 and 6.

⁵ Josephus, Antiquities of the Jews, book II. Chap. v. 3.

and Spain the ignominious punishment of the cross was inflicted only on felons and working people, often for the most trivial, or merely imagined, or trumped up offences, while the arch criminals of "family" were allowed the noble supplicium. This state of things had come to such a pass since the conquest of the countries above mentioned that the utmost misery prevailed everywhere. The land was grasped by speculating Romans of court favor, who were at that time not only numerous but extremely enterprising. Being of the privileged or citizen stock they siezed the beautiful farms formerly worked by the industrious inhabitants, but now under the yoke of voracious conquerors, and assumed them to be their own. Instead of free labor, slaves performed the work.

But labor had been in sackcloth and ashes⁹ for many ages, and it required no additional weight to make it bad enough.¹⁰ Even Gellius who wrote laws to decide their fate, seems to speak with contempt of labor as though it were some noxious reptile to be hurled from his pen in disgust.¹¹ It is almost amusing to read over the queer whimsicalities of our ancestors whose opera quae supersunt often project expressions of petulency and of irritability in view of some necessary but to them, ignominious mention of a class of people on whose toil they depended for their very existence from day to day. Cicero, sneeringly said, when describing his enemy Clodius, ranking him with those laboring men, that he was "without credit, without hope, without home, without goods."¹² This in

⁹ Guhl and Koner, Life of the Greeks and Romans, p. 518. "In crucem figere."

⁷ Cf. Inscription, recently found at Naples containing the death warrant of Jesus.

⁸ Bücher, Aufstände der Unfreien Arbeiter, S. 69, and elsewhere.

⁹ Vide Sallust, Jugurtha, 73. Also Dionysius, B. C. 476 made it lowly enough; Livy, X. 31. "Quinam sit ille, quem non pigeat longinquitatis bellorum scribendo legendoque, quae gerentes non fatigaverunt."

¹⁰ Pliny, Natural History, IX. 25; II. 28.

¹¹ Quod genus Græcii ἀχθοφόροις vocant, latine bajulos appellamus." Gellius 5, 3, §. 2.

¹² Pro Marco Coelio, 32. "Quare oro. obtestorve vos, judices, ut qua in civitate paucis his diebus Sextus Clodius abeolutus sit, quem vos per biennium aut ministrum seditionis, aut ducem vidistis: qui aedes sacras, qui censum populi Romani, qui memoriam publicam suis manibus incendit, hominem sine re, sine fide, sine spe, sine sede, sine fortunis, ore, lingua, manu, vita omni inquinatum: qui Catuli monumentum afflixit, meam domum diruit, mei fratris incendit." Cicero here had not the magnanimity to give Clodius credit for voluntarily casting aside his noble family and his wealth. Cicero, when he said that Clodius had no family, well knew that he was a brother of Appius Claudius, that he was one of the very most powerful representatives of the great gens "Claudia"—the same stock which afterwards produced emperors. We find little in the family to his haughty mind was sufficient to damn them to oblivion. Occasionally there rose a character, so sympathetic and exalted, even in immoral Rome, as to be able to dispel this almost universal contempt and to give expression to the grandest and most truthful sentiments. Of such was the excellent Tiberius Gracchus, who a hundred and forty years before Christ was born, declared that "wild game have holes; and for everything there is some shelter, some retreat; but the poor who struggle and die for Italy, though they have air and light, have nothing more. Houseless and homeless they wander with their wives and little ones. Those military gentlemen lie, who admonish soldiers against permitting workingmen's graves and sacred things to be desecrated by enemies; for not one has a family altar of his own; not one among all these Romans a burial place. The poor must struggle and die for the blustering drunkenness and the corrupted wealthy called nobility whom their labors create and sustain."¹³ We have hitherto made reference to Mommsen who constantly bewails the paucity of mention by great authors, of the poor and lowly;¹⁴ but Mommsen is not the only savant who in rummaging among the musty relics, after such rare gems in vain, sends up his moan of regret. Dr. Drumann repeats the same thing and in blunter and terser terms. "One searches in vain for satisfactory intelligence," regarding the producing class.¹⁵

Such are the difficulties the historian of the ancient lowly has to encounter; and were it not for the tell-tale inscriptions and the musty old rescripts of law, the task could never be performed. But while the most valuable records of bold writers have been left us in fragments and the more time-serving historians have shrugged themselves into silence fearing to face the storms of public opinion, the workers themselves were carving their own history in lines of amazing legibility for the far future students of ethnology and social science.

praise; for he was descended from the same gens with Appius Claudius; but if he turned into a friend of the unions, restored them, fought Cicero on these grounds, and if he comes down to us as their champion and martyr, then the whole labor movement must acknowledge it.

¹³ Plutarch, Tiberius Gracchus.

¹⁴ De Collegiis et Sodalitibus Romanorum, p. 41. "Quoniam exiguum tantum notitiam earum ad nos pervenisse admodum dolendum est."

¹⁵ Arbeiter und Communisten in Griechenland und Rom, S. 15, 5, "Befriedigende Nachrichten sucht man vergebens."

We now turn to the labors of Jesus whom, in order to be consistent with our study of sociology, we must presume to have been what some of the great commentators and even some of the encyclopædists now consider him, an Essene or at any rate, a member of one of the great orders of secret associations so numerous in his day. Lest this announcement appear untenable in the minds of many, we present our proof in consistent detail; inviting further investigation on the part of critics, in rebuttal. Certainly, no harm can accrue from an honest comparison of facts as applied to lessons in anthropology. In proceeding to do this difficult task we must acquaint our readers with things as we find them and reason, like the physicist, from the premises.

We have already stated that there existed along the Mediterranean great numbers of palæographs mostly unearthed within the present century. There is still a dispute as to what they represented. That they are stone slabs, often handsomely graved in relievo, commemorating social societies, all archæologists are agreed. But until lately it has not occurred to their learned exponents that they were genuine labor societies. This however, is the fact.

But while these innumerable palæographs are really the work of labor organizations and economic advantages to manual toil being then, as now, the incentive, because labor then, as now, was the members' only capital or means of support, yet this labor, on account of the taint and disgrace as well as the ruffianly attacks it had in those days to submit to, was for many ages the cause of the societies and their inscriptions; and the thing that lies constantly concealed. But the more popular and trivial issues, like the palliatory flattery of idol worship, the vain-boasting of prophets, the popular flute music, dances, processions, and burial ceremonies, covered up the view of labor; a palliative which secured their permission by law, to exist in Palestine and elsewhere.

The common name of all the ancient societies of these regions, is koinon, and the most important of them, according to Lüders,¹⁶ are the synodoi or synods. Then especially among the Canaanites are found the traders, also known as synodoi plethoi and symbiosis philia. But of course in the widest sense the general name of phratry stood uppermost; since whatever applied to it means "union."

¹⁶ Lüders, Die Dionysischen Künstler, p. 12.

But the name under which the most of them are known in the inscriptions is eranos and thiasos, a description of which we have already given. The eranos, in the Greek was a labor or trade union. From the Greek, all the social societies of the Ægean sea, Syria, Phœnicia and Asia Minor borrowed this name. The same explanation applies to the thiasos. This was an association for common enjoyment, and is consequently considered by the modern archæologists as a branch of the dionysia or the bacchantes. But there is great misapprehension regarding the province and functions of the celebrated god Bacchus. While people of our day associate him with wine and drunkenness the great Numa Pompilius provided for the working people once a year at the Saturnalian festivals of the harvests,²⁷ and during his wise and much honored reign they were encouraged to indulge in festal recreations. The Saturnalia was a great harvest festival. Relaxation, merry-making and even wine conviviality were so far indulged in as to almost sink, pending its duration, the inequalities of rich and poor. Being in December, it was to the ancient Romans, what Christmas is to the Christians.

Now, considered as identified with the manners of the labor organizations, there is a similarity touching the saturnalia sanctioned by Numa. Tullus Hostilius and even the emperors, and the bacchanalia which were breathing moments of the secret labor societies. But the bacchanalia were common in all countries and the bacchantes had their feast at any time during the year. The true cause of their disreputable taint is not that the feasters drank wine. All drank wine, when they were able to pay for it; it was a healthy beverage. The obloquy comes entirely from their being all lowly working people. They were attacked in a ferocious and brutal manner and threatened with extinction because they dared to have an evening dance once a month.

Unorganized, the ancient workingmen were powerless to enjoy even this; but the force of co-operation or confraternity bore its fruits; and by it they could enjoy their convivia.

²⁷ Plutarch, Lycurgus and Numa Compared.

The thiasos¹⁸ was this community gathering, which in their marches and dances used to wear beautiful wreaths¹⁹ and sport red flags and banners. Tracing these societies farther and clearing them of moral mud and slime with which vilifiers of the ancient quill have so bespattered them that the word bacchanal appears in our vocabularies like a synonym of sottishness, we have a decent, well ordered association or union of poor people who work for their living; such as existed all over the country about where Jesus lived. Böckh, cites an inscription of one found at Tyre about 20 miles from Nazareth and after deciphering its epigraph, arrives at the conclusion that although it was a thiasos, it was not a wine bibbing institution at all.²⁰

From Phrygia among the celebrated Phrygian slaves there comes a stone slab which Lüders, in his excellent work, "The skilled mechanic of the bacchanal," has lucidly described. We translate one of his descriptions.²¹

"Above the lettering appears a general picture of the scene. On the right sits a goddess in a long chiton (flowing robe), holding a large shell in the right hand. In the left she holds a tympanum, the bottom resting upon her knee which, together with a modius upon her head, represents her as the goddess Cybele. Near here sits the lion which is known to be the favorite animal of the Phrygian goddess. Besides the goddess, also robed in a long flowing chiton, stands a man holding a cithara on the left arm. Over the altar erected on his right he holds also a shell. A tree shades the altar. A girl leads in a lamb for the sacrifice upon the altar, and another is playing the flute. An aged female figure is finally represented at the extremity of the room in the attitude of worship. Beneath this holy personification is represented another scene, presenting a symposium of 10 persons. With the left arm on the lap, they sit on their pillows eating and drinking, and in front of them

¹⁸ "Θιάσος, ὅσπερ ἐστὶν ἡ ἀπὸ τοῦ πίνειν συναγωγὴ." Phot. 82.

¹⁹ "Polybius erzählt (XX. 6), dass diese Kränzchen in Böotien in grosser Blüthe gewesen seien." (Lüders, Die Dionysischen Künstler, S. 11). Cf. Droysen, Hellenismus, 11, 83, f.

²⁰ Böckh, Corpus Inscriptionum Græcarum. No. 2271. "Thiasos non bacchicus est."

²¹ Lüders, Die Dionysischen Künstler, S. 9, Tafel II.

²² The word "zechen" here used for drinking by the learned philologist, might have been well enough for the date at which it was written; but it is entirely unjust now; for it perpetuates the insults upon the poor. This word is evidently meant to convey to us the idea that they were eating and "tippling."

on one side, flute players while the time with music, and on the other side waiters are busy bringing the viands of the table and wine for the members. Two batons stand leaning against the wall on the right, on whose pointed ends, as we may safely surmise, the bread is toasted and the meat broiled. The inscription reads that the thiasotes, male and female, are in the act of honoring Stratonica their priestess with wreaths; and this for honest service she has rendered their saints or deities, Apollo and Cybele.

Such were the eranists and thiasotes. To our mind, reasoning from the now provable fact that these societies were numerous in the land of Canaan in the days of Christ, it is quite certain that he was a member of an eranos, or of some other secret association like an Eleusinian brotherhood; as by his time, these had assumed a cult²³ which was both practical and religious. His religion was monotheistic but he could not have been more devout.

But we have promised to thread the eranoi farther, that there may remain no doubt regarding their influence or their age and numbers. Having stripped the bacchic thiasos of its traditional terrors, we come to inquire, with Lüders, whereas the solemnity of the particular occasion forbids any such rendering of the inscription. The real cause of the flog is the innocent lexicographer; not the faithful epigraphist. "Thiasotai" is made to mean revellers or tipplers. It means no such thing. The lexicographers are obliged to give definitions such as the sense implied in the historian's account, suggests. Where the fault, if any, resides, is at the door of the historian who throughout the literature of antiquity has signalized himself as the toadying accomplice of the aristocracy.

While therefore, we profoundly respect the careful philologist who, years ago gave us these treasured scraps, yet, from a standpoint of sociology, future archæologists must come to judge of the meaning of words from their self-evident premises. Indeed, the direct discovery of Böckh, whose authority stands pre-eminent, is that "thiasos is not bacchic," "Thiasos non bacchicus est." He makes this plain declaration, evidently not from the common definition at all; but because, on studying his inscription, he sees by its general appearance that though confessedly a thiasos it is far too serious to be a band of tipplers.

²³ Eusebius says boldly, quoting Philo (see chap. xviii.), that these Essenes or Therapeutæ were very numerous in all parts of the world. Eccles. lib. II. cap. 17. Much more may be learned from Philo Judæus, De Vita Contemplativa and Quod Omnis Probus Liber; 12; Lightfoot, The Epistle of St. Paul; Colossians and Philemon. This last author's stricture against the essenes being the order to which the early Christians belonged, brings even more proof of our theory that Essene, Essenoi, is only a phase of eranoi, suitably changed to fit the Judean dialects, of the Greek, and that also it took on phases to conform with the Mosaic code in Palestine and Egypt. A careful reading of Dr. Lightfoot's Essenes, idem, p. 347, sqq. may serve to convince many of this analogy. "While the Pharisees were the sect, the Essenes were the order," (p. 354). We say however, that while the thiasot were the sect the eranoi were the order. Lightfoot (same pages), speaks of their tenets being "of foreign origin." This is still further proof. The grammatical structure, and how changed, is clearly seen on page 355, Essaios, Essenós resemble thiasos, thiasénos. Again, they were baptists. This they got from the venerable custom among the unions, of the constant use of the baths.

more about the Dionysischen Kuenstler, or Bacchic skilled workmen. The Dionysia at Athens were of four sorts, but not necessarily connected with these social communes. In that country, in early times, the Dionysia were feasts, or autumnal jubilees at the vintage. They were amusements at which the boys and girls hopped and caroused. Sometimes they danced upon sacks or ollas filled with water, or climbed the greased pole, or jumped and climbed on bowlders smeared with oil which by their slipping and awkwardness caused great merriment. Undoubtedly the farmers at a bee of this kind sometimes drank wine to excess. The second Dionysia were feasts of the wine presses. It was almost exactly equivalent to our Thanksgiving; fully as religious but less sedate and reverential. It was a series of banquets and festivities at which the meats and dainties were paid for from the public purse. Then there were drinking festivities called anthesteria at which in the spring of the year the citizens gathered and indulged in enjoyments. But we are not quite certain whether the working part of the population were allowed to attend; since citizens in Athens, as elsewhere, in the Hellenic peninsula and, in fact, wherever Greek was spoken, were regarded as above labor. Lastly, the great Dionysia held mostly within the city. They consisted principally of theatrical entertainments at the cost of the state. These again were aristocratical and had little to do with workingmen's organizations.

The anthesteria in the month of February and the great Dionysia held in Elaphebolion, month of March, strikingly resembled the Eleusinian Mysteries, to the description of which we have devoted a chapter. They had secret sacrifices at which the wife of the archon was symbolically married to Bacchus, the celebrated god of plenty. It is quite probable that the poor working people and the slaves, in their longings to rise to enjoyment and esteem, aped these great aristocratic orgies of the citizens, which sometimes were performed—especially at Eleusis—with a display of magnificence only equalled by their mysterious secrecy and their religious pomp. Thus, the labor unions had nothing in common with those orgies and must not be mixed up with them.

In 1864, there appeared an article in the Revue Archéologique, on the eranoi and thiasoi of the inscriptions. The theme maintained that these unions tended towards a cult, and that the result of their humble existence for a period of many ages was an upward and civilizing tendency. The writer, M. Wescher, an archæologist who had devoted much time to deciphering the meaning of relics so curious, took the ground similar to that maintained in these chapters, although he does not pre-suppose that the unionists had anything to do with labor. This is the strongest of all the phenomena which beset the pen of scholars. Granier de Cassagnac wrote his history of the ancient laboring men from that point of view; and although his exceedingly scientific and rare penetration was for 30 years talked down by the savants of Germany and France, they are now maintained by greater ones who acknowledged that they were taught by him. Such was also the fate of M. Wescher, who ventured to suggest that the eranoi, very nearly identical with the Roman collegia or trade unions of which Granier had made his magnificent exposé, were something more than mere religious sects; for we find M. P. Foucart denying the truth of M. Wescher's remarks²⁴ and in his preface, expressing his sensation of pleasure at imagining himself able to disprove Wescher's hypothesis.²⁵ One would suppose that any discovery that they were labor societies would be hailed with pleasure by the most critical; but the contrary is hurled in his old friend's face with scorn.

We feel an interest lively enough in the little polemic of Foucart and Wescher to reproduce an example: Wescher examines the fraternal character of the Associations²⁶ in these words: "Now is it not natural that, at an epoch of inquietude and of religious agitation like that of the great Alexandrian school, the number of these societies should be considerable? Ought we to be astonished that many men and women abandoned the official religion which had long proved itself ineffectual to free culture, arid to the development of spontaneous, fraternal goodness such as responds to the innermost aspirations of the heart? The Greek soil must be considered the veritable cradle of this religious movement. It will redound to the inextinguishable honor of Greece for having planted such examples in the world, before the appearance of Christianity." M. Wescher continues: "The common fund of the societies was devoted to mutual assistance and assurance, destined to furnish advances to members in need," to provide for them in cases of sickness and defray the expenses of a decent burial."²⁷ Farther along he says: "The members were a mutual community, one with another; the well-to-do paid, the indigent received, in rotatory form, as the case happened. Poverty was no motive of exclusion." This last declaration is stoutly met by M. Foucart who says it is based solely upon an expression of Rangabé. In point of fact this communistic mutuality is the only definition ever attached to either the Greek words eranos or Latin collegium! He further quotes from Theophrastus,²⁸ a passage in rebuttal which substantially acknowledges not only, that the eranoi were mutual sharers, but also that the celebrated successor to Plato knew all about them. Not discomfited with this inconsistency he drags up the case of one Læocrates, an Athenian, who being about to move to Megara sells his house and his slaves, charging one of his friends with the task of paying and settling up with his creditors, money he owes and to straighten accounts with his eranos. It does not follow from this, that this rich man was even a member, any more than was Augustus Cæsar a member of the many collegia at Rome which he patronized under the well known name of Collegia Domus Augustalis.²⁹

²⁴ Associations Religieuses chez les Grecs, pp. 139-153.

²⁵ Idem, Preface, p. 14. "Une certaine satisfaction et une certaine confiance."

²⁶ Revue Archéologique, 1865, II. pp. 220 and 227.

The whole of the matter is, that these were poor working people's societies for mutual aid. They corresponded very closely indeed to our trade unions. They had existed from immemorial times as trade and labor societies for mutual support and were almost indetical with the Roman collegia on which we have devoted a chapter, and regarding which evidences in inscriptions and otherwise, are overwhelming. Those poor people did not work all day at wearying drudgery and then labor at night in their unions merely for religion's sake as M. Foucart imagines.³¹ They

²⁷ Here Wescher himself is unable to understand that the fund was for members out of employment, which places labor at the bottom of their organization.

²⁸ Revue Archéologique, idem, p. 226.

²⁹ Theophrastus, Éthikoi Karakteres, 17.

³⁰ Mommsen, De Collegiis et Sodaliciis Romanorum, Cap. V., De Collegiis latæ sub Imperatoribus. The emperor Augustus was of course, not a member of the trade unions but he befriended, protected and patronized some of their labor while a great many of them he suppressed.

had to combine as the men are now combining, to take measures regarding the best advantage at which they might on the morrow, exchange the only goods they possessed—their labor—for their daily bread. Even slaves, when allowed, sometimes joined, to better their condition.

So much for the eranoi. The thiasoi were, as we have described them, simply clubs of the eranoi who arranged and conducted the little banquets and social amenities which throughout antiquity seem to have made life worth living. These thiasoi corresponded to the sodalicia of the Romans.

We have, however, in our description of the Roman trade unions, shown that owing to the severely restrictive and censorious laws, the unions, toward the commencement of the Christian era were compelled to assume a strongly religious and pious aspect in order to prevent being suppressed by these rigors, after the servile wars. Precisely the same in Greece, Asia Minor, Palestine and the Islands of the Ægean Sea; because all these provinces from about B. C. 200 had become Roman territory by conquest. Any law touching them at Rome in the Latin tongue was as rigorous against them in Greece, Asia Minor or Canaan in the Greek or Hebrew. These are the points which the learned Foucart seems to have forgotten. He is an expert as an epigraphist but lacks the aptitude of the comparative sociologist. The keen preception of Mommsen detected and cleared up the mystery in his laws on the Roman trade unions.²¹

These are things which seem strongly to support our argument that a spontaneous, genuine secret movement pervaded the Greek, Latin and Hebrew-speaking countries far and wide at this particular epoch of the advent of Christ. The unity and brotherhood shown to have existed among the secret societies is almost touching. The more the upper stratum of society was distracted by the consequences of the competitive system having failed, on a trial of thousands of generations, the more completely did the brotherly love system of the labor unions grow into usefulness, through accord and mutual support.

There is an example of this seen at the Piræus. The Phrygians were considered barbarians by Greeks and Romans. Their patron goddess was Cybele. Lüders reports that in the Piræus alone, such was the harmony among the orgeons and thiasoi, who represented, apparently without the least jealousy or dispute, many nationalities there, that the Phrygians had an especial temple standing close by the great temple of the goddess Metroon, where she was worshiped by the members of a society whose members called themselves orgeones and thiasotes on the inscription.

²¹ Assoc. Relig. Chez. Les. Grecs., passim. One comparison of them with collegia of the Romans M. Foucart finds this error clearly proved.

²² De Collegiis et Sodaliciis Romanorum. Passim.

It reads that the decrees 15 and 19 provide that strangers be admitted to the society. One of the officers is himself a stranger. In the list of officers, one is a tutelary soter, or savior from Trœzen, and one, Cephalion, from Heraclia. So also women officiated in responsible functions in the same society.³³ At the Piræus was the thiasos embracing the cult of Serapis; of Zeus Labraundos, Metroon and Cybele; of Heroistes, Demos Collyte, Apollo, Nymph Lycia and others. Some of the inscriptions bear date of B. C. 324.³⁴ The fact of their having lived in their quiet fraternal way so many ages organizing, living in common, teaching as they went, and constantly inculcating the spirit of fraternity as it were, underground, while overhead in the great competitive world, kings, nobles, money-changers, and politicians were fighting and dashing each other against the competitory rocks of the Pagan aristocracy, is of itself, strong evidence that they were the real planters of a future state which could not obtain in the open world without a revolution.

Our maxim that the greater the organization of the laboring poor into a brotherhood for common help the higher will be the pitch of human enlightenment, certainly holds good so far as it was able to proceed in ancient times. Its corollary; the higher the enlightenment the more complete the extinction of social and economical grades, cannot be demonstrated until the associative energy expressed in the premises has been carried far enough against the competitive system to reach a majority. When this comes to pass the conclusion will be reached that the intensity of human enlightenment can be tested and measured by the quantity of social organization of this hitherto degraded stratum of society.

The whole story looks as if the offering of ignominy, of Bethlehem, foresaw these three great truths 20 centuries ahead, when he boldly took up the unionist's, culture of a dozen deities, their social methods, their fraternal, interacting love, their meek, silent humility and secret work, brought them grandly forth from their obscurity, proclaimed with an irresistible eloquence and pathos the absolute equality of man and succeeded before the quarrelsome competitive system, its toadies and obsequious devotees, could bring him, like all the rest to the gibbet, in unifying all their gods into one god and forcing the vast movement upward into view and final adoption by the world. The failure of royalty and empire which at his time began to be seen in the states of Greece, Italy and western Asia, proved his words that "a house divided against itself cannot stand;"²⁶ and this celebrated apothegm from his lips is now being used, perhaps more than any other by the labor organizations of the 19th century. Mutual fraternity and arbitration of difficulties without resort to violence or other overt, unchristian acts is proved by unions of trades to be everywhere productive of the most satisfactory results.

³³ Lüders, Die Dionysischen Künstler. pp. 14, 15.

³⁴ Idem, p. 16.

The lines between the followers of the movement and its opponents were definitely and very distinctly drawn. He that is not for us is against us.²⁷ This again has become a common maxim among the trade and labor societies of modern times; so much so, that the investigation of the character of applicants for membership is found necessary before admission.

The law of Solon had provided for the free organization of burial societies among the Athenian poor. He called them homotaphoi. There were the communists who enjoyed their meals at a common table. The law and the language knew them as sussitai. These also were numerous in Palestine and elsewhere along the coast of the Mediterranean. But it is certain that they were labor unions; for Lüders,²⁸ speaking in general terms says that the brotherhood who partook with each other at the common table did this as a moral custom and that the custom was common throughout the ancient world; and in the larger societies received an especial character. There were even societies of privateers, of Phœnician or Canaan-

²⁶ Luke, XI. 17; Mathew, XII. 25; Mark, III. 25.

²⁷ Mathew, xii. 30; Mark, ix. 40.

²⁸ Dionysch, Künstler, S. 4, 5. "Ausser diesen kleineren, ausschliesslich privaten Zwecken dienenden Genossenschaften gab es Schiffer—und Handelsvereine."

ite origin of course; for these were the most formidable of ancient brigands and freebooters. But Solon also permitted such secret organization at Athens.³⁸

Lüders expressly states that there existed universally an organization called by the Greeks deipna apo symboles. It was an eranos or labor union; and "stretched from high antiquity into the second half of the 4th century of our era, when at the Council of Laodicea it was forbidden."³⁹ Our statement that the eranoi and thiasoi were in reality one and the same thing,⁴⁰ the eranos being the labor or business part of the administration, and the thiasos that part attending to the entertainments, is fully confirmed by Lüders,⁴¹ who expressly says their identity as well as functions were mixed; and necessarily, since the eranos not only paid the expenses of its own business with the members, attending to the procurement of situations for members out of employment and to the burial and other expenses, but also helped pay the costs of the convivialities.

Thus, the self-evident fact that the eranoi and the thiasoi which were one and the same everywhere, being made apparent, we come to the further proof of their existence in great numbers in Asia Minor, Palestine and Syria. Lüders remarks that from the Hellenic peninsula the organizations there planted, spread into the islands and Asia Minor where their relics are found still more numerous than in Greece.⁴² Still it is well known that at the Piræus or seaport of Athens, at Eleusis and many other places, including the Laurian silver mines in Attica they must also have flourished in large numbers; although their tendency to cultivate the principle of universal brotherhood was frowned upon by the outside world.

We must introduce here the quite singular but perfectly natural fact that wherever the unions were thoroughly established and, so to speak, nested together, the Christian church was sure to first plant itself. Thus Pergamus, the seat of the great uprising of workingmen under Aristoni-

³⁸ Vide Böckh, Staatshaushalt, I. 762. Lobeck, Aglaoph, p. 305.

³⁹ Lüders, Dionysch. Künstler, S. 7.

⁴⁰ Consult p. 455, chapter xxi.

⁴¹ Dionysch. Künst., S. 7. "Beide Arten von eranos scheinen schon in sehr früher Zeit mit den thiasoten Vereinen vermischt worden zu sein.

⁴² Die Dionysischen Künstler, S. 13.

ous in B. C. 133-129,⁴³ became the mellow ground wherein the early Christians planted and on which they reared one of their most celebrated churches. The laboring people were in trouble at the time of this uprising—one of the bloodiest on record. They possessed organizations throughout the country which they were enjoying in apparent peace, when they were startled by that paltry act of Attalus IV. bequeathing at his death, the whole kingdom to the Romans. Fearing lest they be seized by the hated Romans and reduced to slavery, they unanimously joined the pretender. But there were inscriptions showing that the Pergamenian working people were enjoying a thrifty organization dating from high antiquity down to the coming of the Messiah.

Cappadocia which did not fall into Roman hands until A. D. 17, was also one of the early posts of the Christians. The first epistle of St. Peter bears this name. Here too the labor brotherhoods had a strong foothold. This is rendered certain by the recent discovery of several of their slabs and monuments bearing inscriptions. Laodicia was also a stronghold of both the unions and the early Christians. This place, together with Ephesus and Hieropolis, is where were founded the seven Apocalyptic churches.⁴⁴ The early church found mellow soil among the brotherhoods of the eranoi and thiasoi.

Apamea near Antioch, the birthplace of Eunus, instigator of the greatest of all the slave uprisings, was also the cradle of one of the early churches.⁴⁵ We have, in our account of this great strike shown that Eunus and his men seemed both to be deeply imbued with the everywhere present idea of the Messiah, who was to redeem the world, and also thoroughly acquainted with the methods of secret organization. His knowledge of the auspices, and plan of organization were really at the base of his success. These things, added to inscriptions found in the vicinity of labor unions of an antiquity coeval with this great servile war, show very plainly why Christianity took root so readily in those regions of Asia.

⁴³ See chap. x. p. 242. Aristonicus, giving a full sketch of the event.

⁴⁴ St. Paul, Colossians, IV. 15, alludes to it where he asks that his letter be shown to the brethren in the church of Laodicia.

⁴⁵ Revelations, I. 11. John here also speaks of the church of Pergamus as one of the seven.

Rhodes was also one of the places where Christianity established itself, although its successes there have been sad. But of all spots in the world Rhodes seems to have been one of the most prolific in those queer inscriptions indicating a great labor organization in ancient times. They existed in great numbers on this island.⁴⁶ The abundance of these inscriptions found in Rhodes and at Piræus, have attracted much attention from the archæologists of late. The fact is, the societies being mostly eranoi or labor unions and enjoying in common brotherhood, the scanty proceeds of their toil, had for many ages, prepared the ground for the new plant; consequently it was found mellow and in readiness for the greater Messiah when at last he really arrived.

But one of the most interesting centers of the early church was Apamea, the birthplace of Eunus, the great slave-king of Sicily, Athenion, hero of the second Sicilian strike-war, and Saint Paul the most famous of the apostles of Jesus. This city, not far from Nazareth, was a hive of free labor organizations until stricken by the Roman conquest. It gave birth to three of the most wonderful characters of the history of the lowly and being warmed up in the old cult of the communes, easily became the seat of an early Christian church.

Another significant fact may here be mentioned that Plato takes Socrates down to the Piræus among the communal fraternities of the working people where he and his friends remained for days, as it were, in this socialistic atmosphere. They there discussed and drew up the whole of Plato's most celebrated work—the Republic. Socrates was himself a member and this may account for Plato's notion.⁴⁷ characters, aside from kings and men in absolute power, like Lycurgus, Numa and Solon. These five men represent the labor of five active lives devoted to the improvement of human conditions on a large scale. They are Socrates, Plato, Aristotle, Spartacus and Jesus.

Summing up the mass, we find five great revolutionary

⁴⁶ See Lüders, Die Dionysischen Künstler, S. 37*42 and elsewhere. Foucart, Les Associations Religieuses chez les Grecs, chap. xii. "Les associations religieuses n'étaient pas moins nombreuses qu'à Pirée." They were worshipers of numerous deities. M. Wescher in the Revue Archéologique, 1864, tome II. p. 473, says he collected a list of 19 inscriptions representing as many organizations in the island of Rhodes.

⁴⁷ Plato, Republic, I. 1, Socrates says: "Yesterday I went down to the Piræus along with Glaukon, Ariston's son, to worship the divinity and attend the festival." This tutelary patroness was Artemis, sister to Apollo, central figure of the sun-worship (see chapter on Red Banner). She ranked with the group of labor protectresses, Cybele, Ceres, Minerva, under whom so many organizations were founded.

Socrates and Jesus, the first and the last, seem like an incarnation of two great goodnesses in one. The analogy from beginning to end is wonderful. Both were sons of humble mechanics—one a marble-cutter, the other a carpenter. Both were surrounded by communes of the secret eranoi, and probably both were members. Both preached quietly to their disciples, occasionally addressing open-air mass meetings. Both were betrayed by the perfidy of their own pretended converts and suffered death on the plea of corrupting the morals which the ethics of the same Pagan faith had fostered and grown, out of the hideous philosophy of human slavery. The result to the human race, of these parallel lives and martyrdoms has been altogether incalculable.

Plato, the admirer of Socrates, dared not follow his master.

Aristotle, borrowing from Anaxagoras and Kapila, laid the foundation of human improvement, with great precision, upon the scientific ground-work of mechanics. His ideas, restored by Bacon, are those which the world is now following.

Spartacus, the greatest representative of the purely irascible, the most sublime character and type of the lower philosophy of resistance, who careered on the ground of "an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth," last, and just anterior to the great carpenter, was a shepherd, humble and without ambitions, but because implicated with an age of injustice wherein "opportunity makes the man," magnetized, split asunder, almost conquered the world, which in his day was Rome.

Jesus, who before coming to proper age, is said to have studied diligently, seems to have shaped his life-course from the results of lessons gained by these predecessors. He accepted the acceptable and sternly refused that which bore no promise of contributing to the establishment of a heaven on earth. He gained his great triumph over slavery by adjusting the three moral impulses of Plato and the dialecticians—irascibility, concupiscence, sympathy. He soothed the jarring bitterness of the first by coaxing concupiscence from its ancient realm and bringing it down to “want,” and married them together by the tie of sympathy, the impulse most matured by the social unions; and there formed the stronghold of his doctrine from beginning to end.

Plato, the ancient mouth-piece of them all, as he is resurrected in Neo-Platonism, after a test of 7,000 generations, must be placed, by those engaged in the labor problem of to-day, as an extraordinary tissue of harmony and absurdity. He wanted the better (or individual), to overcome the multitude (or worse).⁴⁸

The experience of these 7,000 generations since Plato, forces the now living family of mankind to pronounce an opposite opinion. It is the masses who are “beautiful,” (as Plato used that word); while the individual proves himself constantly to be the lying, bribe-taking, merchantable “sell-out” and under-dealer; ready as a rule, under the competitive system, for any trade, seditiously corrupt, planning schemes of jobbery; and he has actually to be watched by the honest masses.

Plato wanted slaves. His slave system, large already, during his life-time was small compared with its hugeness after his philosophy was promulgated and its influence extended to the Roman conquests. Before his time, slaves were the children of the citizens. Soon after him, Rome in her enormous conquests, turned the vast populations of that age into rebellious slaves, and the world became almost depopulated. This master not only wanted degraded slaves, but he laid down laws for them, consigning them to death by torture for unpremeditated homicide while the master was allowed, if he murdered a slave, to be tried by his friends, acquitted and no stigma inflicted upon his name; and Plato lays down a law to that effect.⁴⁹

The entire enlightenment of our modern age repudiates

⁴⁸ Laws, I. 3, 4, Bekker, Lond. ed.

⁴⁹ Laws, IX. 9. More on Plato's views of Slavery will be found as follows: Breeding mean with mean and best with best, Republic, V. 8. Great fear of slave uprising in consequence of the system, acknowledged, IX. 5, Id.: “Abject race,” Statesmen, 46: Necessary to possess slaves Laws, VI. 19: Agricultural slaves, Laws, VII. 13; For homicide the slave must invariably die: preferably by torture, Laws, IX. 9; Such punishment must be “clean,” ie, vengeance, Laws, XI. 2, 10, fn.

this as unfairness, relegating the slave system to a realm of low barbarity. On human slavery, the subsequent world has emphatically pronounced against Plato's views; and the little investigating mites of Aristotle, and the working elements of Jesus, are banishing it from the earth.

Plato wanted war.⁵⁰ He laid many plans and laws upon his theory of external strife, wishing only education and mutuality within. Neo-Platonism took it up, and in blasphemous contradiction to the teacher, endorsed it, and actually engrafted this Pagan precept into the mild and peaceful system of Jesus.

Things have not turned out to substantiate these counsels of the great philosopher. Wars the people had; and the wars made a million slaves. Eunus, Athenion and Spartacus resented by warring back; and when the world, devastated by combined horrors of war and slavery, got time to breathe and recruit, another slave-war struck mankind even in our civil rebellion, with the final result to fix the conviction that the peace plan of Jesus was correct.

Plato wanted it understood and implicitly believed that all things spring from the most high, the mythical and invisible inhabitants of Ouranos; and that men derived existence, and were watched over from those heights in the vaulted dome of heaven, the Olympian abodes—whence an endless chain of priestcraft.

Neo-Platonism engrafted these absurdities into a Christian dogma.

Modern common sense, backed by science, with its innumerable tools proving the true laws of nature, finds the facts to be the exact reverse of the Platonic dogma, and is wheeling us back to the physicism of Aristotle, that it is the little things and the little men and women who perform all works, who produce all that is produced; that it is not the great, conjured to be so in the elastic imagination, who accomplish anything, but the infinitesimals that do it all.

⁵⁰ Republic, vii. viii. Polemarch is made to say that justice consists in doing good to friends and evil to enemies. Socrates however, in an ironical sally of moral reasoning demolishes Polemarch's logic wheeling him unto the great thesis of Jesus which now proves to be the idea that alone can prevail: See Matthew, v. 43, 44, 24; John, xv. 17. First Epistle of John, ii. 10, 11. The anti-war teachings of Jesus are actively forcing these horrors from the earth just as chattel slavery has been forced out of existence and wages slavery is fast following.

Jesus, if we read him rightly, appears to have been less a Platonist than an Aristotelian and when he comes to be preached in our pulpits from labor points of view, there will be found hundreds of texts whose meanings, long smothered, will furnish substance enough to solve the problem.⁵¹

Emancipation came from Christianity.⁵² The great principle of mutual love among all men was the really original idea and practical work of Jesus. He taught a new doctrine—a peaceful plan of salvation.

Spartacus, who represented the old method of alleviation from suffering, based upon the irascible principle with its wars and bloodshed, was, beyond all cavil, the highest type of that culture. He was evidently informed on the great wars of Viriathus, Eunus, Athenion and perhaps Drimakos. But in both opportunity and military aptitude Spartacus surpassed them all. He lost. But after the million crucifixions of his own and a few generations preceding him, and the enormous lessons which his own and his predecessors' blows had administered to cruel, concupiscent Rome, who shall have the temerity to say that these blows, crucifixions, bloody scenes and awful lessons did not go far, very far, toward shaping the convictions of Jesus, who but continued the great conflict with his milder leadership?

Modern progress, which has almost outgrown chattel slavery, still seems quite undecided in regard to the plan of Spartacus; and might even yet swing back upon it, were it not for the stern, inexorable hold which Jesus maintains in the wreck of his tortured, priest-ridden temples—and this hold is the hope of the future; for his plan applies with wonderful harmony to the investigations and experiments of Aristotle.

Plato wanted the unequivocal mingling of religion and politics.⁵³

⁵¹ There are many expressions recorded in the New Testament which are vague in meaning and must remain so until better understood. After this they may be used by ministers of the gospel, in the labor movement.

⁵² Compare Canon Lightfoot, On the Colossians, p. 321; Böckh, Die Laurischen Silberbergwerke. Hundreds of the most candid authors acknowledge that it was the Christian cult which finally fought down this terrible institution. In going, paganism had also to go. But as we study the origin and course of events we must acknowledge that the blow against slavery had been struck before the advent of Christ. He it was, who killed slavery by tempering the spirit of human kindness.

Modern statesmen, notwithstanding the almost desperate struggles of priest-power to hold firm this Pagan grip, are now steadily disestablishing state and church; and the verdict of enlightenment both in the realm of science and sociology, is to cast overboard, as worthless and pernicious, this old idea of Plato and let religion and politics each take their course alone. Jesus not only separated church from state by admonishing the typical money-changers, but he said: "Render unto Cæsar" etc. The Cæsar here referred to, was the mild Augustus, whose reign was, in political respects, a model, and a glory to Rome.

Plato wanted an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth.⁵³ He encouraged hatreds even in his "city of the Blessed," and trained an army of both women and men to the science of fierce contention.

"Resist not evil," the law of the mechanic of Nazareth, has so far supplanted these savage doctrines, that already the trade unions and other social and labor organizations in many countries, are discussing and planning to resist against men of Plato's class, on grounds that they themselves are forced to become innocent victims of a hateful idea which pits them, like Spartacus and the gladiators, against their fellow men, who have given them no cause for offense.

Yet all things considered, the world cannot afford to belittle Plato, the father of idealism; even though many of his time-serving thoughts are passing away. His mind was too great for his age and his weaknesses were but subterfuges which saved him to a good old age while bolder men were martyred in comparative youth.

But Aristotle who began with microscopic things, whose mind, a consension of Kapila, of Anaxagoras, of Empedocles, of Parmenides, of Zeno, of Plato himself, is, as the world grows old and wise, and as light gleams in upon intelligence, beaming more brilliantly with each decade; and this great man's thoughts are laying bare the incrustated truth and leading to the final, perfected philosophy. Aristotle's is the mind which draws ever nearer as the ages waft him farther away among the satellites of an awful forever.

⁵³ Laws, book VI. cap. 7, Bekk. It was always so in the ancient code. Neo-Platonism and the Nicene Decrees afterward succeeded in getting this old Pagan thing back into the Christian church where it still remains, in some countries.

⁵⁴ Plato, Justice, 5; Republic, passim; Laws, in many places.

Jesus, who planted among the communes and laborers all that was good and pure, but whose beautiful works have been almost banished by the proud old paganism still adhering in his temples, departed only to return ; for these growing squadrons of the modern mites foretell that he is fleeting back to assume command of a great army of unreconciled but longing intelligences, which the ancient working people quickened, and which the suns of two thousand years have mellowed for the harvest.

